OPENING MEETING.

plebiscite was taken merely and solely to ascertain the opinion of the people upon prohibition. When a responsible administration came to the task of legislating, of making the law, then the Parliament would have to face these tributary questions, but they were not germane to the present issue. The man who recognized intemperance as a great evil, who believed that the liquor traffic produced and sustained the evil, and that the proper attitude of government to a traffic which produced and sustained evil, was to interdict and prohibit it, was bound by every consideration of common sense to vote "yea" on the ballot.

He held however that the present receptiveness of the public mind, should be seized upon by friends of the reform to exploit every argument to overthrow every sophistry and to overwhelm all opposition. Prohibitionists had so much faith in the righteousness of their cause and in their ability to establish it in the face of all opponents, that they were delighted to find the opportunity of meeting this opposition, and could be depended upon to turn the present occasion to the best possible account, in making and strengthening public opinion for the final struggle of concretizing sentiment into legislation and administering it.

He said the enemy would put up the battle at three points mainly; 1st that prohibition was an arbitrary invasion of personal liberty; 2nd that the public chest could not stand the strain if the loss to revenue which would follow the enactment of such a law; 3rd that it could not be enforced. The latter two he promised to discuss tonight's at meeting as they lent themselves more consistently with a week evening meeting. The first he took up and handled in a thorough fashion. He made a discriminating enquiry into the difference between personal liberty and social liberty, personal rights and social rights and pointed out that to establish social liberty our personal liberty, was restricted and invaded at every point. He put in the form of an amusing narrative the adventures of an innocent individual who in a dozen different ways ran up against the law, in a series of very reasonable activities upon which he had a natural right to enter, but which were prohibited for the public good. He frankly confessed that as in these cases prohibition would be an arbitrary interference with personal liberty, that social liberty, social order and social justice might be enhanced. The simple question to be asked was: Is the drink business at war with social interest? By that test it must stand or fall. He then entered upon an eloquent and powerful indictment of the traffic as a foe to every interest and virtue of society, and closed with a fervid appeal for enthusiastic, intelligent cooperation to the campaign.

More About Corporal McLeod.

The following was in type for Saturday's GUARDIAN but inadvertently failed to appear in connection with two other notices. The Ninth Regiment is the one to which Corporal McLeod belonged:—

BOSTON POST AUG. 15TH
The following letter from Private Charles C Donoghue of the Ninth Massachusetts, dated at Santiago July 25, to Captain L. H. Babbidge, gives a detailed account of the regiment's march to Santiago. He tells of the sturdy stand made by the Ninth Regiment boys at the left of the firing line.

"Lew: if you could only see the Ninth Regiment to-day you would be surprised. They are fighting and undergoing, when bullets of high calibre would be but welcome visitors to many I and four more men are the only ones in our company not sick. Two days ago every man to the captain was sick. I got out of it luckily so far. There are on an average from 50 to 60 men from each company on their backs. But up to date only one has died. We buried him yesterday. He belonged to Company G, and was a fine fellow."

"Here is my opinion of this epidemic: Without our shelter tents, woolen blankets and underclothes for seventeen consecutive days, two of which it rained continually, and one night it fairly rained in torrents; and when every man had to stick it out without his change of clothes, without his blanket to keep him warm while he dried his clothes, is one reason and the second reason is that we have not had any medicine in the regiment until a few days ago."

"I won't attempt to give you details. I will do that when I get home. But our hurried march on the night of July 1 to the front was a long and tedious one. We were to report to general Shafter at 12 o'clock that night, and we did. We reached our place under a continual cross-fire of the enemy. About 1 o'clock under command of Major Grady (Colonel Bogan being sick, and the lieutenant colonel having dropped out from exhaustion on the march.) we came up next morning and resumed charge. We acted as the extreme left of the firing line. We received but two orders to fire, though we were cautioned that, should the Spaniards try to flank us, we were to hold that position until the regiment was helpless, and under no consideration were we to retreat, even if they took or killed half of us. As luck happened, they never got that far to the left, but they did charge our right centre of the line. All at once the centre line let loose, and the Spaniards haven't charge since. The regulars were the right centre, and when they heard their rifles speak, one fellow shouted. 'We've got them now boys.' Our rifles made so much noise that it drowned the noise of the magazine rifles. We then took post duty, and remained there until we were ordered in to participate in the official surrender of the city of Santiago. Such cheering, Lew, you never heard! It rang out from regiment to regiment, from mountain to mountain. The regulars christened us the 'Irish Tigers,' for when we cheered we were the only ones who gave the tiger."
