AN APPEAL FOR HELP

For an insant the three were motionless as figures in a tableau,—Doris, Mariana, and Craig Cullam.

Then Doris said, with a composure that belied her pallor: "I came to tell you, Mr. Cullam, that your car is at the door."

She trruned away.

Craig Cullam could hear the light tap of her heels on the parquetry of the hall. They seemed to be beating into his brain, beating a requiem to his hopes of happiness.

He stood, unmoving, just as he had released Mariana from his embrace. His arms hung helplessly at his sides. His eyes had taken on again that stately, implacable look.

Mariana had sunk into a chair. She covered her face with her hands and little shudders convulsed her slim shoulders.

"Oh, go! go!" she gasped in muffled tones. "Go before I have you thrown out?"

When he made no answer, only stared at her with that queer expression that sent little chills of fear to her very heart, she gasped again:

"Oh, how I hate you!"

The mask of his face changed slightly, but he only said quietly:

"You mean that?"

He bowed deeply. Mariana thought it ironical.

Doris was nowhere in sight, when he came out to his waiting car. The other members of Mariana's house party were on the veranda to wish him godspeed.

Linda Harrington, quite forgetting the sound scolding she had given Mariana about this very young man less than an hour ago, whispered to Alan to date him up for the following week-end with them.

But Cullam, already behind the wheel of his car, courteously declined.

"I shall be very busy next week. The show is closing soon and I'm doing a bit in the pageant you know. I'm rarely able to accept social invitations. This," he smiled faintly, "this was rather a special occasion."

Linda and Geraldine Seabury exchanged significant glances.

Hal sauntered up hesitantly, looked at Cullam appealingly.

"I say, old man, would you mind awfully giving me a lift to town tonight?" he asked in a lowered tone. "Geraldine's coming up tomorrow with the Harringtons, and I—well," he grinned a bit shamefacedly, "I say, these house parties play the devil with a fellow's love affairs."

"They do!" agreed Craig Cullam with a trace of bitterness. "Hop in."

He felt sorry for Hal, who had obviously not had the pleasantest day with his fiancee, no more pleasant, perhaps, than he, Cullam, had had. There was a bond of sympathy between them. He only hoped the fellow wouldn't insist upon talking all the way to town.

As a matter of fact, the trip was made in almost complete silence, each man sunk in gloomy thought.

Craig Cullam was floundering in an abyss of despair. He knew now that there was no hope for him with Doris, even if there had ever before been the faintest, lingering possibility.

She had seen him conduct himself as a roue and a cad. She had witnessed his love-making to her sister behind her husband's back. And there was no one to tell her that he had been acting a part to save that sister and her husband from shipwreck!

Wild thoughts of trying to communicate with Charles, even though the latter was travelling and would have no address for a week to come, tempted him while he tossed through a restless night. But with the dawn came sanity and discretion.

What right had he to ask Charles to explain the farce to Doris? She had never given him more than friendship. It was presumption on his part to believe that she gave the matter a serious thought. Undoubtedly she had merely put him down as a boor, a bohemian, whom it was unfortunate her sister had entertained, an acquaintance whom she herself would be careful to eliminate in the future.

But again, when he had risen from an almost sleepless bed, tubbed and dressed, and tried to force himself to breakfast, his desires swung round the circle and he determined that, come what may, he must reach Charles and ask him in the name of friendship to vindicate him with his sister-in-law. His love for Doris was too great to make it tolerable for him to stand helplessly by and be degraded in her eyes.

He despatched a wire to a hotel in San Francisco—the only address Charles had given him.
