JUST A GIRL

BY JANE PHELPS

ZENA'S FIRST DAY IN AN OFFICE

CHAPTER 22.

It was nearly 11 before anyone came near me. Then Mr. Claxton appeared.

"I understand you are quite expert," he remarked as he sat down. "I dictate very rapidly."

"I am not expert, Mr. Claxton, but I soon shall be."

He iriwared, then replied: "Well, let us see what you can do!" and then without seemingly halting to breathe, he dictated a letter of which I caught perhaps one word in four.

"I am afraid I won't do for you, Mr. Claxton," I knew my voice trembled, and I saw the beads of its trembling.

"Too fast for you?" "Very much too fast. I'm sorry." I rose. Naturally they would not keep me.

"Sit down. Perhaps I can talk a little more slowly until we get acquainted. Along afterwards, he told me that could I have seen my name in the paper, I wouldn't have known myself I looked so happy."

He repeated the dictation, this time more slowly. While I did not get it all, I knew I had the important things and that I would be able to write a good letter from my notes.

"I judge you haven't had much experience," he said after an hour's steady work. "I was exhausted—unable to concentrate, to get every word possible. At times he would forget and dictate as he had at first. In a while he would catch himself up with a little laugh, and speak more slowly."

"Not any kind of work," I replied.

"Not any?" astonishment in his voice.

"No, sir. I have studied very hard to fit myself for such a position, because my health would not permit me to do heavy work such as I have been doing—before I was taken ill."

He looked at me queerly, yet I thought with a just interest, than he had before.

"You do not look fitted for heavy work. What sort of work was it, if I may ask?"

"A girl friend and myself took a little money I had—I did not think it necessary to mention I had pawned my jewelry to get it—and started a small shop."

"What kind of a shop?" "We called it the 'Two Sisters Shop,' but it really was a paucal shop. My landlady, Mrs. Fagin, helped us."

"From the very first—that is we were successful in a small way; did better than we could have expected on our small capital."

"And because of illness you had to withdraw, and take a position. When did you learn typing and stenography?"

"While I was ill. That is, I commenced to study typing then, and when I found that I could not get such a position as I wanted without stenography I worked in the shop part of the day and went to a shorthand school."

"You haven't always been a working girl," he said so kindly that I felt my eyes mist.

"Since my father died, yes." "How long ago?" "Two years—nearly."

"Thank you, Miss Stewart, for your confidence. Please do those letters as soon as possible, and perhaps you better have Miss Lee look them over before you bring them to me to sign." Then as he caught the embarrassed look with which I heard his suggestion that I refer my work to another employee, he smiled a little and added: "No, never mind. Lay them on my desk. 'I'll glance them over myself before I sign them."

"Thank you, Mr. Claxton."

"How terribly hard I worked to have those letters perfect! I was in a large, quiet, handsomely furnished office; my employer had evidently an interest in me—he had said 'please' and talked to me as if I were a real human being instead of just a part of his office machinery, as so many places where I had applied for work seemed to consider their employees."

I breathed a little prayer for help and set to work.

Hint for the Motorist

By ALBERT L. CLOUGH

BOILING RADIATOR

D. writes: After running five or six miles my radiator water will boil and the engine will begin to miss and jerk. What is the cause of this? There is a little oil coming up through the cylinders. I have tested my cooling system.

Answer: The combination of overheating and oil-pumping brings to mind the possibility that your radiator oil is not of a sufficiently good quality so that it retains its body under heat. If this is the case your overheating is due to excessive piston friction and your missing is caused by oil-fouling of the rings in a combination with poor compression, due to the oil being very thin around the pistons and not making a good gas seal. If your oil remains properly thick when hot, the overheating may be due to weak fan action, too much retarded spark radiator passages clogged or rubber connections closed or rubber connections closed up internally. If there is any question as to the quality and quantity of your engine oil, this better be settled at once.

VALVE TIMING

H. E. N. asks: What is the right way to time a four-cylinder, high-speed engine? What makes an engine knock when there is no carbon in it and the bearings and pistons are as good as new?

Answer: All that we can give you is a typical setting, used in this shop practice: Intake opens 12 degrees past upper dead center, inlet closes 33 degrees after lower dead center, exhaust opens 55 degrees before lower dead center, exhaust closes 12 degrees past upper dead center. Under conditions such as you describe, the most common causes of knocking are the following: Too early spark, engine loose on crank-case, loose flywheel, timing-gears loose on shafts or some of their teeth damaged, loose pushrods, worn or loose cams or compression too high for the quality of fuel used.

AS TO SHOCK ABSORBERS

J. H. L. asks: Can you give me any advice as to shock absorbers? If they did not cost so much—I should have a set of the air-cushion type put in but I found that you might be able to suggest something more reasonable in prices.

Answer: Very good results are obtained with shock absorbers of the rubber type, which permit the springs to deflect unhindered on the downward movement of the car but check the severity of the upward motion or "rebound." These are comparatively inexpensive, are readily applied and withstand severe usage.

Questions of general interest to motorists will be answered in this column, space permitting. If an immediate answer is desired, an envelope self-addressed, stamped and care of office.
