HOW TO MAKE
way for a solution of some long-pondered problem.
"As students, many of us have had this experience: After working hard at night on a particular problem, we have solved it with ease the next morning. Such work, accomplished by the mind without our consciously directing its activities, would appear to be the very opposite of concentration. But remember that without the intense, concentrated effort that went before, such flashes of insight are not apt to occur.
"One of the best exercises I know of for actually developing skill in concentration, for young and old, is to read carefully a paragraph of a book, then turn the book down and name the essential points covered in that paragraph. Once you can do this, with a short paragraph, practice doing the same with a longer paragraph, and then several paragraphs.
"Or jot down the main points of an address by a speaker, and when the address is over, with these points memorized, develop the speech over again in your own way.
"It is well to recall what a few of our notable men have said on this subject of concentrated energy. Under all these sayings one may see a common denominator of meaning and emphasis: namely, that the great difference between those who achieve and those who fail consists not so much in the amount of time devoted to work by each, but in the degree to which he intelligently applies his powers, mental and physical, to one purpose. Charles Kingsley said:
"I go at what I am about as if there were nothing else in the world for the time being. That's the secret of all hard-working men."
"And Carlyle:
"The weakest creature by concentrating his powers on a single object, can accomplish something; whereas the strongest, by dispersing his over many, may fail to accomplish anything."
"And Dickens:
"The one serviceable, safe, certain, remunerative, attainable quality in every study and pursuit is that of attention. My own imagination would never have served me as it did but for the habit of humble, daily, toiling attention."
