Buried Treasure Of Old Pirate

Found by German, Who Will Keep Silent Till Assured of Share

LONDON, Dec. 16.—The buried treasure of Stoertenbecker, the pirate who lived in ths fourteenth century, appears to be still alive, according to the Berlin correspondent of "The Times."

The treasure was recently discovered near Cuxhaven. Herr Bruno Kiep, the finder who has sent in to the Government his report on the discovery of the treasure, now claims as his reward one-tenth of its total value. This, however, must be made over to him in actual treasure, not, as he says, in paper marks. The treasure he values at 10,000,000 paper marks (12,500 pounds), so that his share would be 1,250 pounds. But, sooner than take papers marks, he declares that he will be altogether silent and refuse to inform the authorities of the location of the treasure.

The taxation authorities are now on the track of Herr Kiep and wish to tax him on the whole value of the terasure. Herr Kiep claims exemption from any such tax on the ground that he is making the state a present of 9,000,000 marks. According to the German law, one-half of the treasure-trove belongs to the owner of the property on which it is found and the other half to the finder. There appears to be a possibility of the state's taking the whole, on the assumption that it is ownerless property.

Herr Kiep, however, is in the strong position of being the only person who has actual knowledge of the hiding place, and he is prepared to keep the secret as long as is necessary. Meanwhile, he wants a tenth part of the actual treasure, free of income tax. The matter has become further complicated by the appearance of persons claiming to be the descendants and heirs of the pirate Stoerienbecker. An acient deed has been discovered, made between a Duke of Saxony and the town of Hamburg, in which it is agreed that the whole of the treasure shall belong to the Duke.

DISCOVERY THAT MAY SAVE TROUT AND WHITE FISH

SAULT STE. MARIE, Ont., Dec. 16.—The discovery that a normal water parasite known as hydra fusca feeds on fish spawn with most destructive effect in fish hatcheries has been made here by Dr. Nelson Graham, and it is believed will mean the saving of millions of trout and white fish. Dr. Graham made the discovery while at work on bacteriological tests of his finding is being communicated to the Ontaro Fish and Game Department and the Dominion Department at Ottawa.
