The Mystery Of The Singing Walls

Blood on the Hands

At the sight of the men at the end of the corridor Anne reached out her arms. Then her knees sagged and buckled; she gave a little choking cry and collapsed in a heap. As John saw to his knees beside her, Brady, lit'wed by Hughes, came pitching out of the apartment, and each checked himself sharply to avoid tripping over the girl on the floor.

"What is it, Miss Mason; quick!" Graham urged, bending over John's shoulder.

Anne tried to speak but her trembling lips only bubbled meaningless sounds. Her eyes were still veiled with fear.

"What the hell does this mean? Hussy snapped out turning on the two detectives who stood gaping at Anne a puzzled look on their faces.

"Dammed if we know" the stocker of the two men declared. "We bring her down her chief following orders. Hughes planted himself at the windows overlooking the court. I was located just inside that door there. And, you bet, we never took our eyes off her."

"At first she covered herself with a rug and lay down on the divan a while. Then she sat before her dressing table and began to doll her hair. And, then, all of a whack she let out a yell that turned me stiff and up she jumped and reeled back against the table mumbling something about blood. And she kept holding out her right hand which had a red daub on it like the rouge women use."

And then she sort of gets hold of herself and was starting over to the dressing table again when she stops like a frozen peep, her eyes popping out of her head. And before you could say 'Jack Robinson' she let out another yell and beat it into the hall. There's really nothing the matter, chief. She's just lost her nerve and gone off the handle. That red streak on her hand is nothing but rouge."

John had slipped his arms around the trembling girl and was gently stroking her hand. She had thrown her head back against his chest and kept sucking the breath into her lungs in gulps, opening and closing her lips like a fish stranded on the shore. She was still terrified shaken, only half-conscious of the group of men bending over her.

"Anne, dear, what was it?" John urged anxiously. "What happened?"

The girl put both arms around his neck and drew his head close to her. Pressed against him he could feel her warm body shivering in little spasms. Momentarily she let her lower lip stop his quivering.

"It was blood, John," she gasped. "Oh God! It was blood on my hands."

"She's hysterical with fright, that's sure," concluded Graham. "You attend to her Osborn. The light and I will find out what's brightened her. Come on, Hughes, show us where she was sitting."

As the detectives filed into the room John picked up Anne in his arms and, rising to his feet, carried her along to the sofa in the Murder!

"It's hopeless" the police officer concluded, placing his ear to the stricken detective's chest. "He was killed instantly. You see? The jugular vein has been pierced here in the neck below the ear and he has been twisted in the wound."

Drawing his revolver, Graham threw wide the French doors and crossing the red tiling, stopped at the foot of the stairway leading to the roof.

"It's" he called. "Burke's been killed. Yell over the parapet and tell O'Rourke and Royce to come right up. And warn the others to see that no one leaves this house. And watch that stairway to the roof, and if any one tries to make a getaway, give him the works without any questions."

As Graham turned Busby gently lowered the crimsoned head of Burke to the floor and hitched himself, unsteadily to his feet. For a second he stood looking down at the crumpled form lying with one arm twisted beneath it, the other stretched out to the wall, as broad as if warding off an attack. There was a glistening over the old detective's eyes as the rays of the lamp struck him full and the corners of his grim, thin-lipped mouth quivered.

"The veteran's voice had a husky break in it. "Good God, say he isn't dead. He's been my best boy since he came to me a kid patrolman over in Brooklyn."

Graham had come up beside the sharp blow on the shoulder. "Get hold of yourself old man," he said gruffly. "The skunk who killed that boy is in this house. It's our job to get him."

Squaring his shoulders, pulling himself to his full height, the policeman jerked his set with a snap, and he swallowed at a lump in his throat.

"You're right, George," he said. "Come on! Let's search the house."

"There's no use until O'Rourke and Royce show up," Graham admitted bluntly. "We'll make a systematic hunt. They'll be here in a second. I guess that's them now."

Outside in the corridor came the sound of heavy feet and two blue-coated policemen appeared on the threshold. At the sight of Burke's body they drew back and the leader, a big, burly Irishman, made the sign of the cross.

"Men" Busby spoke slowly with a hard, steady note in his tone, "you see what's happened to Burke. The rat that killed him is in this house. Search it with a fine-toothed comb till you find everybody except Dr. Darnell and Mrs. Mason, who are with Hughes and Brady. Bring them into that billiard room on the floor below. Royce will do the searching while you, O'Rourke, keep watch on them in the billiard room. Don't let any one wash his hands, get rid of anything and watch out. You're dealing with danger."

As the detectives started for the room, Anne Mason followed by Dr. Darnell, Hughes and Brady hurried to the room.

The physician looked at his knees beside the pitiful figure crumpled beside the woodbox. Skillfully, his long, dexterous fingers felt the pulse. Then, with a shake of his iron-gray hair he rolled on his side the body and wiped away the blood pouring from the neck.

"The man is dead," he declared looking up over his shoulder at the two detectives. "There is nothing to be done. The knife penetrated three inches into the cord and the murderer must have twisted it in the wound."

"But is there nothing you can do?"

There was an agonized note in Busby's tone.

The physician looked at the police officer and shrugged his shoulders helplessly. "Then he turned to the girl, who, pale, her hand at her throat was staring at the ghastly form on the floor.

"Anne" he requested, "will you go down and stay with Beatrice? She is very ill, and I cannot leave her alone."

As the girl started across the blue Chinese rug, Graham nodded to Hughes and Brady.

"Keep close to Miss Mason," he ordered. "Place her between you when she is walking through the corridors. Examine thoroughly Mrs. Hammond's room before you let her go in and station yourselves at the windows, and he said. Remember that her life is in the gravest danger and don't fall down on your job the way we did with Burke."

John had accompanied Anne to the door and, for a moment, gripped her by the elbow as he stood looking down into the golden depths of her eyes.

"Don't you want me to come with you?" he asked. "I am so anxious about you, dear."

The girl shook her head gravely. "You couldn't very well help with Beatrice," she reminded him. "These men will watch over me. And I want you to stay with Mr. Graham and the captain so that you can come to me at once in case there are any fresh developments."

And, with a brave tilt of her head, she took her place between the two detectives and passed out into the hall.
