CHAPTER XIII

Though Mrs. Gamble was small, she was very erect and her back was straight as a ramrod, her white head held very high. And though she sat in a low rocker surrounded by comfortably shabby Victorian furniture, with yellowing portraits framed in walnut on the walls, she wore a well cut blue frock and she marked her place in one of the more modern novels as she rose to greet them.

"Nice of you to come on this soggy day," she said. "I was resigned to spending the afternoon with this book. I was not feeling sorry for myself. Have this chair, Miss Warfield. Bruce tells me you are a business woman?"

"I'm with a tour bureau. It's quite interesting. We haven't expanded yet as much as Teresa Harrison hopes to."

"I've never seen anything," sighed Sally Gamble, "and now I'm too old and stiff to venture. So I sit by my fire and toast my swollen joints and let people who write show me the places I was too timid in my youth to explore for myself. And I raised two children who are as much vegetables as I was."

"But—I thought you liked staying at home, Mother?" Bruce said.

"I do like staying at home. A good thing, now, since I can't go down three steps without grunts of misery. What's Avis doing — playing the piano?"

"She did play for us. She plays beautifully."

"She could have toured Europe in concert—and she married a college professor. And now — if Bruce would only sell himself and get another wife, she'd like to marry a fellow who works in a bank."

"Oh, but look her, Mother," Bruce protested, "I'm not interfering with Avis' life. She hasn't made up her mind about Dan Thomas, anyway. And do you have to marry me off so precipitately?"

"You're no earthly good the way you are," snapped his mother. She gave Virginia an impish, wise smile, and Virginia felt her prickling uneasiness returning again.

The feeling of being on guard increased when they had said good-bye to Mrs. Gamble and started back through the damp orchard and the grove where already blue shadows of dusk were beginning to gather. Bruce held her arm to help her over rough places and then he slowed suddenly, and Virginia felt the clasp of his fingers tighten.

"My mother," he said suddenly, "likes being outrageous now and then. But aside from that she's a very clever woman—because she sees that I'm in love with you," Bruce went on, standing still now, keeping his hold on her arm. "I wonder if you've seen it, too?"

"Oh — but please, Bruce — I can't. Can't we be friends?" she asked unhappily.

"D you want me for a friend?" he countered, his brown face set, his lips very straight.

"I do want you, Bruce. This has been such a nice day —knowing you—you and Avis and Merry —and your mother—"

"You've been happy today?"

"But—of course, I feel so at ease—as if I were at home." And that, she knew instantly, was the wrong thing to say.

For Bruce was quick. "You feel at home because this is where you belong—you're a home person, Virginia. You're a woman made for loving and cherishing — not for haranguing hotel men and whatever else it is that Teresa Harrison makes you do."

"Oh, but I liked haranguing those hotel men. I got a thrill out of it. And I like my job, too, Bruce."

"And you don't like me? Is that it?"

"How ridiculous! Of course I like you. But I've known you only a little while—and I can't fall in love — with any one, Bruce. I'm sorry—but I can't."

He released her and she began to walk away, Bruce following closely.

He said, "Is there some one else, Virginia?"

She hesitated and her throat ached with a sharp, cramping pain. Her voice came, low and harsh, so that Bruce had to lean forward a little to hear. "Yes," the word was little more than a breath, "there is some one else, Bruce."

"I'm sorry." He walked a few steps, his hands thrust into his pockets. "I didn't know, of course—"

"No—you didn't know. But we don't have to change — do we, Bruce? We needn't spoil what we have?"

"I can't change, Virginia, I can't stop loving you, merely because you happen not to care — now. I'm not giving up, you know. I'm going on—loving you—even if you'd rather I didn't talk about it."

"Thank you, Bruce. I'd be so glad if you didn't talk about it. And I think the woman who could love you will be very lucky."

"I'm not going to stop hoping," he said firmly. "I'm not giving you up—not so long as there is a ray of hope."

This was cruel and unfair, she hated herself for doing it — for not speaking frankly, but pride—was it pride or merely vanity that kept her silent? No, it was hurt pride—a stiff sort of pride that would not let her admit, even to herself, that she had married a rover who loved his roving best, who had, so it appeared, loved her so casually and so lightly that only a few miles, only a few days, could make him forget!

They strove, as polite people do, to recapture old ground, to be as before. But Virginia caught Avis Andrews' eyes upon them once, sharply, saw her mouth twist a little and then straighten into a dry, thin smile.

She wondered as they drove back to Washington through the gathering darkness, if she could have loved Bruce if she had never met Mike. No two men could be more unlike; Bruce, quiet, tall, gentle, a trifle grave; Mike so impulsive, so volatile so effervescent. But Mike could be tender, too—tender and sweet. Suddenly her heart went wailing through the empty void of sky and earth and sea—crying as the curlew cries seeking what it may not find, in the hollow twilight.

"Oh, Mike—come back to me! Come back to me — and love me again!"

And only the rain answered, dripping from the naked trees like tears.

Annual Meeting of Queen Charlotte Naval Auxiliary

The monthly meeting of the Women's Naval Auxiliary was held in the Wardroom of H. M. C. S. Queen Charlotte on Friday evening, Jan. 18.

The president Mrs. Stephen Trainor was in the chair and welcomed the members for the first time in the New Year.

The roll call showed 23 members present.

After the routine business several interesting matters came up for discussion, and the following reports were submitted:

Mrs. Brown, convenor of the entertainment committee, outlined arrangements made for the "Welcome Home" reception and dance for Naval Veterans on Tuesday, Jan. 22 in the Sporting Club. Many letters of appreciation had been received from naval personnel, thanking the Naval Auxiliary and the Citizen's Reception Committee for the interest shown in preparing such a treat for the Island Sailor and his partner.

Mrs. Lafferty—sewing committee, stated that a great many Christmas stockings had been made for the Christmas treat at H. M. C. S. Queen Charlotte.

Mrs. Reddin—Welfare Committee told of visits paid to Naval Veterans in the Sanatorium, for whom fruit, etc., had been provided

The treasurer's report showed a satisfactory balance in the Bank. Money was voted as follows: $100 to the delegates to the Student Veteran's Society Conference held recently in Montreal to defray necessary expenses incurred. $25 to the Canadian Legion Drive. A further sum of money to be decided on by the executive to help pay the cost of the Christmas treat $75 towards the Auxiliary's share of the Welcome Home Dance expenses. These and some small sums to pay outstanding bills were passed for payment by the members present.

On motion the meeting adjourned.

TRELLIS VS POLE HOPS

Work on hops by the Dominion Department of Agriculture has become more diversified since the establishment of the Illustration station at Fournier, Ont., in 1937 for the express purpose of studying the nutritient requirements of this crop. Studies relative to methods of training and disease control were instituted in 1939. Results from five years' work in comparing pole training to that on strings attached to an overhead wire trellis give average yields of 961.8 pounds per acre on the poles and 993.1 pounds per acre on the wire trellis. Hill mortality has been slightly lower on the trellised area throughout the years' experiment.

THE BITTER END

To "the bitter end" has a natural origin. A ship's anchor chain, at the point where it was fastened to a vertical timber called the bitt, was known as the bitter end.

Canadian Nickel brings Cotton to your home

COTTON is not grown in Canada—our climate is too cold. Very little Nickel is mined in the United States—most deposits so far discovered there cannot be mined at a profit. So Canada imports American cotton. The United States imports Canadian Nickel. Each product helps to pay for the other.

Canada produces 90 per cent of the world's Nickel, but uses less than three per cent. So we must continue to export Canadian Nickel if we are to continue to employ thousands of Canadians in the Nickel mines, smelters and refineries, and other thousands who produce the lumber, power, steel, explosives, machinery and supplies used by the Canadian Nickel industry.

Canada cannot keep on importing from other lands unless she exports Canadian goods. By constantly seeking to expand the uses of Nickel at home and abroad, the Canadian Nickel industry brings additional benefits to Canada.

"The Romance of Nickel" a 60-page book fully illustrated, will be sent free on request to anyone interested.
