THE WOMAN HE MARRIED

BY JANN PHELPS

INEXCUSABLE BLINDNESS

Chapter 98

Junior was sent to Los Angeles to school. Not once did I suspect Dick of any ulterior motive in sending him away. Nor do I even now believe he himself was conscious of any. He believed it best for Junior, so arranged it for him.

It almost broke my heart to see him go, but boylike he was glad of the new adventure, and so I tried to be glad also. But how I missed him! No more boyish confidences, for although he wrote twice a week, letters aren't the same as the personal talks a mother has with her son.

What puzzled me most about Junior's going was the evident relief his absence was to Dick. I knew he loved his son, loved him devotedly. But there was no mistaking his expression the day Junior left. It was relief, sheer and simple, I said to him.

"We shall miss him dreadfully!" my eyes full of tears. We had stood on the platform until the train that took him away was out of sight, then turned homeward.

"Of course we will miss him, but it is for the best." Again I saw that same look of relief upon my husband's face.

You may think that I was willfully blind, that I was lacking in common ordinary sense not to see the trend of all these things of which I have written. But when one considers that they were drawn over a long period, that there was nothing really blatant that I could give a name, it will not seem so strange. It was more like many different impressions received during long spaces in which nothing happened to bear out the impression.

So after a few days I ceased to think of that look I had seen on Dick's face, or thought of it only as a fragment of my excited condition because of Junior's departure.

I had been more than usually busy. Our house was finished, and I was decorating it, naturally with the greatest delight and enthusiasm. I had plunged into work after Junior left, taking all I could possibly do with the help of a capable woman. I would have gone mad from loneliness those first few months had I not had something to occupy my time aside from my routine duties in our home.

Dick had commenced his book. I was elated when he told me he was going to do it. I insisted upon working and putting my money into the general fund, he would try to make it worth my while. That sounds as if I had done more than he. It was not so. His stories had grown very popular and he had received good prices for them, especially in the last year. I also had done well. My success with Juanita's bungalow, when the Hibbard house, had led to all and more than I could do. I had even refused several contracts.

Then when our home was finished, the home to which I had so long looked forward with glowing anticipations, I added the decorating of that to my outside work.

I had been so delighted when Dick told me he was going to commence his novel, so sure of his ability to write a great story, that at first I said nothing and thought little of his withdrawal of himself more completely than before.

Perhaps this was in part, due to the fact that he had been doing this gradually for a year, more noticeably so since Junior had gone away. It was only when the boy was at home on his vacations that I saw much of Dick. His work seemed absorbingly absorbing.

His work, and Juanita. They had collaborated on several stories. Naturally she had to be with him to do this. Yet sometimes when I ventured into the study and saw them sitting so closely together beside the big desk I had given Dick, I felt out of place. I seldom remained long.

When I knew the book was to be written I almost unconsciously held the thought that Dick would now occupy the study alone. He would not need Juanita. She would have no excuse to be so constantly with him. But I was mistaken. It seemed that Juanita had travelled extensively in the past, Dick wished to lay his story, and that much of it had been inspired by tales she had told him.

Once in speaking of my delight that he was to write the book, he said: Juanita inspired the story. Her vivid tale of what she has seen, where she has been, has been the greatest help to me. As Juanita was with us at the time I could say nothing, probably would not have anyway. But my heart felt heavy. This would mean no cessation of the intimacy in the study.

I should still feel—in their way. Tomorrow—Realization.

Hints for the Motorist

LIGHTS VARY IN BRILLIANCY

C. K. asks: Should the lights on my car be brightened up considerably when I speed up the engine? If not, what is wrong with the electrical system?

Answer: No, they should maintain a nearly constant brilliancy under brightening, when the engine reaches a speed equivalent to say 12 to 15 m. p. h., at which the generator is cut into circuit, because the battery is undercharged and the generator voltage is much higher than the battery voltage. A progressive brightening with increasing speed, is generally due to failure of generator regulation, which permits the voltage to build up unduly, or to poor connections between the generator and battery. If the battery becomes disconnected from the generator, this occurs in an extreme degree. If your lights are rather dim when the engine is stopped, we should suspect an undercharged battery, but if they are normal at such times, but brighten abnormally with increasing speed, you better look to generator regulation and to the contacts in the charging circuit.

DEFECT IN CYLINDER WALL

C. R. I. writes: On taking my engine apart, I find a small pitted spot on one of the cylinder walls, low down in the bore. Will it be necessary to have this spot welded?

Answer: If this is so far down in the bore that the lowest of the piston-rings above the wrist-pin never reaches it, we doubt if it does much harm and should hardly recommend your having it repaired, as if the bottom ring reaches it a compression leak will be caused and possibly some oil trouble.

OPENING FIELD TO "KILL" GENERATOR

P. N. K. asks: Will it damage the generator to run my car without the battery being in connection. The instruction book says "never run the generator without first removing the field fuse. If the battery is not in connection with the generator."

Answer: You can run your car with perfect safety to the generator, even though the battery is removed, after you have taken out the fuse in the field circuit of the generator. By thus opening the field circuit, you prevent the building up of voltage by the generator and it will remain entirely inactive until you put the fuse back.

RESOLUTION OF APPRECIATION

Resolved, moved by Mrs. F. L. Hazard, seconded by Mrs. M. C. Pomeroy that the Ladies Auxiliary of the P. E. I. Protestant Orphanage now in regular session, place upon record their most hearty appreciation for the work performed by the Ross Sewing Circle for the benefit of the orphan children; believing that if these goods had to be procured through the usual channel, it would mean an expenditure of upwards of three hundred dollars.
