

Hello Folks!

An important part of my diet ever since my first bottle has been Crown Brand Corn Syrup. Now, that may be all right for a little character like myself, but let me tell you, these grown-ups sure are lucky what with Mom serving them Crown Brand Corn Syrup with so many of their dishes. And she uses it in her baking, too, as a sweetener. I can hardly wait until I'm old enough to have some hot waffles or pancakes smothered with delicious Crown Brand. If it's as good as it is in my cereal—mmmm!

For years doctors have recommended the use of Crown Brand Corn Syrup as a satisfactory carbohydrate acting as a milk modifier for bottle-fed infants.

"We Must Signal"

It was Kay who saw it first, that shape like a great bird approaching on wide-spread wings. At first she pointed it out to Mavis as a vulture or crane, then suddenly realized the truth and sprang up. "It's an aeroplane!" she cried. "We must try to make them see us." Forgetting everything but the urgency of the moment she ran out, crying to Lovelace. "Look! There's a plane! How can we show we want help? Oh, quick! What's the use of standing there, staring up at it?" They waved and shouted, but without the faintest effect. High overhead the aeroplane sailed on, glinting in the sunlight like a gigantic metallic-bodied insect, so high that they could barely hear the throb of its engines. I was unlikely that its crew could even see those moving specks against the drab of green which marked the oasis; certainly they did not realize that the atoms needed their help. It passed on, disappeared over the northern horizon; Kay and Lovelace stared at each other, and the girl stamped her foot in disappointment. "Why hadn't we done something? Why didn't we think that aeroplanes would be likely to pass? You might have remembered," she accused him. "They could land here as easily as possible if they only knew."

"I hadn't thought of it—and I don't see now what's to be done," he retorted sulkily. "Then think! There must be some way of attracting attention, some sort of distress signal, instead of wasting time like this: I know! Something like they do at aerodrome landing fields, those big figures and circles and things on the ground. They'd show up well against the sand."

Such stones and rocks as there were in the oasis had too much the general khaki colouring of the desert itself to be of much use. Even the thorny bushes had a yellowish-green tinge making them inconspicuous. But the palms—suddenly Kay had an idea. "If we could collect enough palm-branches, they'd show up against the sand," she cried. "We could twist them into any shapes we wanted, peg them down with stakes or stones. I'm sure that would do and we must do it, without wasting any more time."

Kay was already running towards the nearest clump of date-palms. There were a certain number of fallen fronds, although not enough for their purposes; while the girl gathered them together, Lovelace set to work energetically enough to cut down some of the growing palm-branches. He swarmed up the sloping trunks of one or two trees, which had been partly felled by sand-storms and brought armfuls of tough feathery boughs out into the flat, clear space three or four hundred yards away from the oasis itself which Kay had already decided upon as the most suitable spot for their signals of distress. She looked up as he approached, frowning with effort and concentration. "I've thought of the best letters to put—S.O.S.," she cried. "Quite unmistakable and easy to twist into shapes, too. They must be huge, though, so as to be seen plainly. We shall want ever so many more palm-branches than that and lots of stones to hold them down. Do hurry! We must get it all done before it gets dark to work."

Without answering Lovelace flung down his armful of boughs and went back to the oasis. He felt angrily resentful at Kay's manner, her ungrateful energy, yet at the same time, he had never been more powerfully attracted to her never thought her lovelier than now, with those flushed cheeks and bright excited eyes. Leaning against the scaly trunk of a palm, he cursed Kit Carson, cursed Mavis Grange, cursed his own bad luck, with everyone and anyone who now appeared to him as obstacles between himself and Kay, or, at least, between him and her love.

For I'll keep her whoever tries to steal her," he muttered. "I won't give up my rights to any con-founded Interloper. She's mine and I'll see that she doesn't forget it. Funny that I should have come to care like this—and for my own wife too! It's something that I've never felt before and I've been in love often enough."

"Bring some more leaves—quickly!" Kay's voice came thin and clear from a distance. "I've used all these."

The two worked with concentration and determination in a silence which lacked any sense of pleasant companionship and co-operation, yet served its purpose well enough. Kay's hands were soon bruised and bleeding from the sharp-edged palm-fronds which she twisted and dragged into shape.

The dark-green branches showed up well against the pale sandy surface, the curved snakes of the S's, the circle of the O, at least fifty feet in diameter.

In the dusk which had fallen before the task was completed the letters stood out uncannily conspicuous, black on white and Kay nodded with satisfaction. "They can't miss that," she decided.

From Beyond The Horizon

The greater part of the next day passed without incident. Not even an aeroplane appeared to provide doubts, hopes and fears. Lovelace had spent most of the day stretched in the warm sand under a scented thorn-tree, half dozing, half brooding sullenly. It was towards the middle of the afternoon that he suddenly appeared in the doorway of the tent where Mavis slept and Kay turned over the leaves of an already-read magazine.

He spoke abruptly. "Something's going on behind the sandhills over there." "What is it? What do you mean?" Kay looked up. "I don't know. Listen."

Kay was already on her feet. Standing with him outside the tent, she heard, from what seemed a considerable distance, a succession of sharp whiplike cracks. "What is it?" she repeated. "Firing. Rifles, if I'm not very much mistaken."

"Sportsmen out shooting. I suppose. Is there any sort of game in the desert?" "Gazelle and strike. I suppose, but this doesn't strike me as being sport. They're firing too quickly, more like volleys. We ought to know soon, anyhow; the noise is coming this way."

Kay looked perplexed and doubtful. "Do you mean you think it's fighting?" she asked. "Trouble between the tribesmen or something of that sort?" "Of course it might be that high ride to the left."

Mavis was awake too, now. Listening propped on her elbow Kay turned back into the tent to explain the situation, just as Lovelace gave a sudden sharp exclamation. "I say—Good heavens, look at that!"

Kay swung round. Along the desert track from over the furthest ridge, swaying and lurching from side to side, a large motor car came into sight. "What's the fool of a driver doing, going at such a pace?" Lovelace muttered. "It's asking for trouble over ground like that—hullo! So that's why!"

In close pursuit of the car a group of five horsemen had appeared at a gallop, followed by another four, scattered over the sand-dunes beyond. They rode with long cloaks flying out behind them over their horses' cruppers on the breeze, shouting and waving long rifles, pausing to fire them at intervals.

RUSSIAN SAYS U. S. PLANS MILITARY BASE IN PALESTINE LAKE SUCCESS, N.Y., April 20 (CP) — Russia, New Zealand and Australia urged immediate enforcement of Palestine partition despite United States offer today to send American troops to implement a proposed United Nations trusteeship plan in the strife-torn Holy Land. In the first meeting of the 58-member political committee of the General Assembly's second special session on Palestine, Russian delegate Andrei Gromyko charged that the United States is attempting to make Palestine a military base. The slashing attack came soon after Warren R. Austin, chief United States delegate, outlined American "suggestions" for a temporary control of Palestine by a group of selected U.N. members. Gromyko said that Britain and the United States are attempting to divide Palestine into Jewish and Arab states. He said Britain did not stop troops from entering the Holy Land to engage in the struggle between Arabs and Jews.

Ellen's Diary

Increase the number that precede us to the milking in the mornings.

This has been a tedious day for grand-daughter, confined as she has been indoors, by this Wintery day of weather. Hill and valley were blanketed, evergreen and roofs were powdered thickly with white this morning. "Not more snow!" James exclaimed rising to an elbow as the dawn came through the branches of the old birch. Only he mills under dark amid the expanse of white, set in quiet waves. I thought of it when I poured the milk for James' cereal, adding a dot of cream, as he likes it. "Trot season opens tomorrow!" I remarked, going back in my mind over the intervening months, that to anticipate had seemed so long, but had gone by swiftly. "Well, well," James returned "so it is—I don't believe I ever saw it more wintry for the time of year!" Stars glimmer faintly now and the forest confirms their promise of clearing skies tomorrow.

The snow and subsequent unsettled weather today, brought a rare spell of leisure to James and me. Not that we actually planned for it. On the contrary it stole upon us. It came after dinner—a quiet soxy meal of pig's knuckles, one among James' favorite dishes, though not cooked entirely on this account today, but more to use the remaining meal in the barrel in order to make room for more curing presently. Hooks, then and a bowl of cabbage and baked potatoes that James found delicious. For dessert we had squares of a Cottage Pudding which was only a cake warm from the oven. Topped with jelly and whipped cream it provided a choice ending to our menu. A cake is a versatile piece of baking. "What excellent possibilities is contained in a white cake!" a woman said to me recently. "Warm, it can be used for a dessert, the remainder left makes for tea and if some still remains, it will make Mocha cakes for evening company!" It is not unlike great-uncle's chew of tobacco that was chewed, smoked and snuffed, so that not a crumb of it was wasted!

Then feeling at peace with the world, James and I did arm-chair and picking up the newspaper, we commenced to read pausing at times to comment on anything of mutual interest. I was clearing the table and attending to the tidying-up which follows any meal. "These here increased freight rates, Ellen," he remarked. "Yes?" I said and waited. "They're going to play the d--- with our Island farming—just wait and see. Think of the handicap we'll have to contend with to put our products on the market. We'll never be able to get prices to cover our costs and make any gain on our outlay of money and labor. I'm thinking that will put a damper on all production this year." By this I had come to sit near him, bringing an end of knitting to finish. And presently in the silence, the vapor slipped from his hand, and fell unheeded to his knee. James was astep. And while I continued to knit the yarn grew heavy, the fragrant scent of cherry-wood spattered a sleepy tune, like that of the white cat that climbed to purr on my lap. James face grew dim and my hand and I too slept. A very nice day this has been. Until tomorrow — Diary — Good-night.
