A telegram received from Belgrade says that the difficulties made by the assembly have reached the ears of the Czar. He immediately requested the Russian ambassador to ask an audience of King Peter, and said that it would be desirable if the king refused his consent to the motion of the parliament.

He also said he had understood it was the wish of the entire Serbian folk to present to their princess the money, but that he had quite understood that a poor people like the Servians could not afford to give so large a sum.
