FRIDAY, JUNE 3, 1904.

THE MOTHER OF EXHIBITIONS.

It is beyond the memory of most newspaper readers that the first great world's fair was held in London in 1851. This was the mother of the many and much greater exhibitions since held. Democratic as world's fairs now are it reads strangely that the first one should have originated in a suggestion from Buckingham Palace. The Prince Consort, father of King Edward VII was the prime mover. He brought the matter before the Society of Arts in 1849. A royal commission was appointed for its management. The scheme was fully launched on March 21, 1850 at a Guildhall banquet, the Prince Consort being the chief speaker. He declared its object to be "to give the world a true test, a living picture, of the point of industrial development at which the world of mankind has arrived and a new starting point from which all nations will be able to direct their further exertions."

But though well received in a limited circle the scheme was destined to be met with determined opposition. The London Times thundered against it and Punch did its best to turn it into ridicule. In one of Leech's cartoons the Prince Consort was represented as "The Industrious Boy" holding out a cap on which was inscribed "Please remember the Exposition." Col. Sibthorp in Parliament pointed out the demoralization that must result. "Take care of your wives and daughters: take care of your property and lives," was his frantic warning. The forces of old-fashioned Toryism in Parliament and the press deliberately set themselves to defeat the scheme. They attacked each feature in turn. The Prince suggested Hyde Park for the site, and an immense outcry arose. Lord Brougham opposed the use of the Park for such a purpose. The promoters did not venture to ask Parliament for a grant, but raised $775,000 by subscription and a guarantee fund of $1,000,000. But no one had much idea of what it would cost, and none ventured to hope that it would pay its way.

With the site and guarantee fund at length secured, what manner of building should be erected? Out of 233 plans submitted not one was satisfactory. All contemplated a huge brick building which would have justified the complaint against defacing the Park. Joseph Paxton, formerly a gardener to the Duke of Devonshire, solved the question by purposing a structure of iron and glass, the Crystal Palace as it came to be, and was afterwards knighted for his happy thought. His plan was accepted. The building was 1851 feet long to commemorate the year, and covered 19 acres. The Park elm trees were not destroyed but left standing within the lofty structure. On February 12, 1851 the building was opened to exhibitors, one half the space being reserved to Britain and her colonies and the rest left open to the world. On May 1, 1851 the Queen formally opened the Exhibition in dignified and impressive ceremony. She was then only in her thirty-second year, and afterward pronounced this one of the happiest moments of her life. No disturbance marred the opening although 25,000 persons were in the building at one time and 700,000 lined the route of the royal procession.

The great exhibition remained open from May 1 to October 15 when the Prince Consort declared it closed and the awards were published. The total attendance had been 6,170,000, the largest number on one day being 109,700 on October 8. All expenses were met and there was a surplus of over $1,000,000. The tide had completely turned. People were now as unwilling to have the Crystal Palace removed from Hyde Park as they were at first to have it placed there. But in 1854 it was removed and re-erected on a hill in the suburb of Sydenham. There it has since remained a famous place for musical festivals, flower shows, etc. A notable occasion was a service held on the last day for the Indian Mutiny when Spurgeon preached there to a congregation of 23,000 people. The great success of the first world's exhibition was hoped at the time to presage the dawn of perpetual peace. But the Crimean war came within a few years, and many other wars since. The exhibition of 1851 was small compared with the St. Louis exhibition now going on, but it was then the greatest show the world had seen and can never lose the distinction of being the first of its kind, and the ancestor of all that have since taken place.
