KING PETER Many children may have been wondering how King Peter of Yugoslavia, who is the youngest king in Europe, fills up his time. At first there was a great effort made to send him back to his preparatory school in England, and we have not the least doubt that would have been the very best thing possible for him and for Yugoslavia. Unfortunately the Constitution of the country forbade the King leaving it for any but brief visits. Now we hear that he has an English tutor who looks after him and his younger brothers and a few chosen companions of his own age who are encouraged to try to get that their fellow-pupil is the king. Now that he has come to the throne he has a whole bedroom to himself, a small, very simple room his brothers occupying a much more pretentious room near by. Anything like self-indulgence is rigorously ruled out. Up he has to get at 6.30 every morning. His breakfast is taken with his brothers and consists of tea, porridge, some meat, bread and butter, and marmalade. His lessons sound terrible for a lad of eleven: five modern languages, civics or statecraft, history of his country and dynasty and military science. We must suppose that there is the usual background of reading, writing and so forth. At any rate, part of the day is spent with his mother and brothers in simple family life, when he is able to forget the shadow hanging over him and can really be himself.
