The House of Dreams-Come-True

By Margaret Pedler

(Continued) He flashed by, his arms folded across his chest, moving with long, rhythmic strokes which soon carried him to the further side of the rink. Jean's eyes followed him interestedly. He was unmistakably an Englishman, and he seemed to be as solitary as herself, but, unlike her, he appeared indifferent to the fact, absorbed in his own thoughts which, to judge by the sullen, brooding expression of his face, were not particular pleasant ones.

Soon she lost sight of him amid the scattered groups of smoothly skating figures. The scene reminded her of a cinema show. People darted suddenly into the picture, materialising in full detail in the space of a moment, then rushed out of it again, dwindling into insignificant back dots which merged themselves into the continuously shifting throng beyond.

At last she bent her steps towards the lower end of the rink, by common consent reserved for beginners in the art of skating. She had not skated for several years, owing to a severe strain which had left her with a weak ankle, and she felt somewhat nervous about starting again.

Rather slowly she fastened on her skate and ventured tentatively on to the ice. For a few minutes she suffered from a devastating feeling that her legs didn't belong to her, and she wished heartily that she had never quit the safe security of the bank, but before long her confidence returned, and with it that flexible ease of balance which, once acquired, is never really lost.

In a short time she was thoroughly enjoying the rapid, effortless motion, and felt herself equal to steering a safe course beyond the narrow limits of the "Mugs' Corner"—as that portion of the ice allotted to novices was unkindly dubbed.

She struck out for the middle of the rink, gradually increasing her speed and reveling in the sting of the keen, cold air against her face. Then, all at once, it seemed as though the solid surface gave way beneath her foot. She lurched forward, flung violently off her balance, and in the same moment the sharp clink of metal upon ice betrayed the cause. One of her skates, insecurely fastened, had come off.

She staggered wildly, and in another instant would have fallen had not someone, swift as a shadow, slipped suddenly abreast of her and giving a supporting arm round her waist, skate smoothly beside her, little by little slackening their mutual pace until Jean, on one blade all this time, could stop without danger of falling.

As they glided to a standstill, she turned to offer her thanks and found herself looking into the lean dark face of the Englishman who had passed her when she had been watching the skaters.

He lifted his cap, and as he stood for a moment bareheaded beside her, she noticed with a curious little shock—half surprised, half appreciative—that on the left temple his dark brown hair was streaked with a single pure white lock, as though a finger had been laid upon the hair and bleached it where it lay. It conferred a certain air of distinction—and added value of contrast—just as the sharp black shadow in a neutral-tinted picture gives sudden significance to the whole conception.

The stranger was regarding Jean with a flicker of amusement in his grey eyes.

"That was a near thing!" he observed. Evidently he judged her to be a Frenchwoman, for he spoke in French—very fluently, but with an unmistakable English accent. Instinctively Jean, who all her life had been as frequently called upon to converse in French as English, responded in the same language.

She was breathing rather quickly a little shaken by the suddenness of the incident, and his face took on a shade of concern.

"You're not hurt, I hope? Did you twist your ankle?" "No—oh no," she smiled up at him. "I can't have fastened my skate on properly and when it shot off like that I'm afraid I rather lost my head. You see", she added explanatorily, "I haven't skated for some years. And I was never very proficient." "I see," he said gravely. "It was a little rash of you to start again quite alone, wasn't it?" "I suppose it was. However, as you luckily happened to be there to save me from the consequences, no harm is done. Thank you so much."

There was a note of dismissal in her voice, but apparently he failed to notice it, for he held out his hands to her, crosswise, saying: "Let me help you to the bank and then I'll retrieve your errand skate for you."

He so evidently expected her to comply with his suggestion that, she found herself moving with him towards the edge of the rink, her hands grasped in a close, steady clasp, and a moment later she was scrambling up the bank. Once more on level ground, she made a movement to withdraw her hands. "I can manage, quite well now," she said rather nervously. There was something in that strong, firm grip of his which sent a curious tremor of consciousness through her.

No one Appreciates it more than Baby does

Two Free Booklets for You

To learn all about this good milk write for "Contented Babies" and the Carnation Cook Book—two very interesting booklets. Address Carnation Co., Limited, Aylmer, Ontario.

THINK! Carnation is fine, natural milk, safeguarded at the source. It has every nutritional quality of the best bottled milk—plus the priceless advantage of super-digestibility! Not only dependably rich in vitamins, but also easier to digest than raw, boiled or pasteurized milk. What a wonderful food for your baby . . . endorsed by many foremost specialists not just for healthy babies but for babies unable to digest milk in any other form.

The Milk of Many Uses Carnation is super-digestible because it is heat-treated and because homogenization makes the cream globules one thousand times as tiny and evenly distributes them through the milk. So for cooking, Carnation is super-smooth, improving the texture and consistency of milk dishes besides adding richness and flavour. Use Carnation in cream soups, sauces, custards, cocoa, ice cream, candy. Enjoy its creamy double-richness—and economy—with coffee, fruits or cereals.
