Get Acquainted With Your Spouse! Dorothy Dix Says You May Find Nice Surprises

When a Man Knows so Little About His Wife That He Can't Choose a Christmas Present She'll Like; When a Woman is so Blind That She Thinks Her Husband Has Ceased to Love Her Because He Never Mentions It, Who Can Wonder That Their Marriage Fails to Endure?

One of the most curious things about marriage is that a husband and wife can live together for forty years without ever really getting to know each other. They never have more than a speaking acquaintance and are as ignorant of what their mates really think and feel as the impulses that motivate them, of what lies deep down in each other's soul as if they were casual strangers who were meeting for the first time.

It seems impossible that two people could exist in the intimacy of marriage even for a month without having penetrated the secret chambers of each other's heart and mind and having a good working diagram of each other's character.

A familiar illustration of this is to be found in the custom husbands have of thrusting checks into their wives' hands on Christmas and on anniversaries with the adjuration: "Buy something for yourself. I don't know what you want." Or, worse still, of wasting good money on buying things for their wives that their wives especially loathe and abhor.

It is incredible that a man should not know his wife's taste when she talks about them continually and makes them the touchstone by which she lives. It is unbelievable that a man should not know what his wife wants when she spreads hints all over the place about how much she desires a new washing machine, or a sports car, or an emerald bracelet.

And you can't imagine a man looking at his wife every day for years and years without discovering whether her complexion indicated green or black in a frock, and whether she could wear flapper models or stylish stouts.

But it happens. The woman swallows her chagrin at her husband's not knowing her well enough to know what she wants and returns perfunctory thanks and the husband is hurt because she doesn't show more appreciation and he never dreams that she would rather have the simplest and cheapest gift that showed his thought of her and his knowledge of her than she would a check worth a hundred times the amount it cost.

As a general thing women are much better acquainted with their husbands than their husbands are with them. Women have had to study their husbands from the time they were born, and their husbands have not had to study their wives until they were married.

Many women, however, are so abysmally stupid that they never learn even their husbands' taste in food or the subjects of conversation that are like a red flag to a mad bull to them or the fact that you can sell them any idea if you make the right approach.

It's hard to describe. We stopped at the rock a moment, and when we were leaving, this voice told us to go back. The unaccountable thing about it was that the words seemed to have been spoken just a few inches from our ears.

"Mr. Snavelly," asked Warren, perhaps we should wait until tomorrow to see the books—could you give an idea of the earnings?"

Snavelly observed the young man for a moment. "Yes, Mr. Warren, I can see that you're a good deal better off than I am. You want them ain't complicated, neither. We sell twice a year, after the fall and spring run-ups. An' we buy twice a year—stock up the commissary. Grey took his share of last fall's with him—ain't some?"

"But, Mr. Snavelly," asked the girl, "ain't there any money?"

Snavelly stood up and took an old daybook from the mantel. Slowly he turned the pages, wetting his thumb at every page. He looked up. "There's a hundred an' fifty-one dollars an' eight cents of partnership money in the bank."

Closing the book with a snap, he returned it to the mantel, repeated himself and waited patiently for more questions.

"Mr. Snavelly," said Warren, "when we were coming along the road shortly before we saw the house, we heard a—well, we had a queer sensation, as if some one who was very close by spoke to us."

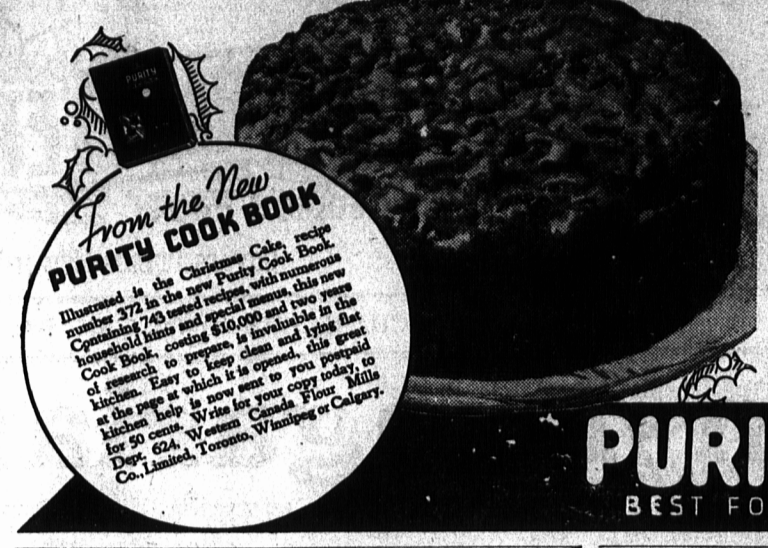

"You did?" Snavelly leaned forward and watched Warren's face keenly. "Was it by a big rock down in the gulch?"

"Yes—yes, that's where it was. At least that's where we thought we heard the whisper—it was rather weird."

"Tell me about it—what did it say?"

they are the volcano-under-the type. The men are dumb when it comes to expressing their feelings. Love-making is an agony to them.

I know a woman who has been in a state of tears half of her married life because her husband likes to tease her and she takes all of his kidding as fault-finding, and she has never seen that it is really humorous petting.

SOLD! "Let me see some of your black kid gloves," said a woman to a shop-girl. "These are not the latest style, are they?" she asked when the gloves were produced.

"I didn't think they were," went on the lady, "because the fashion pairs."

The bad Indian come to the arroyo. The chief try to step over the dead old man. But he stop. Into his ear there comes a little whisper. All the bad Indian hear the whisper. It tell them things and they are much afraid. They go out of the San Jorge Valley and they do never come back.

"Always there is the little breeze in the arroyo. Sometime it whisper. More I do not know!"

Beneath the legend Harry Grey had written, "The old man tells me that for centuries the Indians have used the big bowlder in the gulch as a council place. They believe that when the need is heard the voice will advise them."

"What do you think now?" For the first time Snavelly had asked a question. Neither the girl nor her husband found an answer.

"Can you tell us any more?" asked Warren at last.

A KEY MAN He was applying for a job. "What postilion did you hold in your last situation?" asked the prospective employer. "I was a doer, sir," said the boy very seriously. "A doer!" exclaimed the interviewer. "What do you mean by that?" "Well, sir," was the reply, "when my boss wanted anything done, he would tell the cashier. The cashier would tell the bookkeeper, and the bookkeeper would tell the junior clerk, and the clerk would tell me. And as I hadn't anyone to tell, I used to do it."
