MAGPIE GOWNS

Gowns that combined fashion with drama in their contrast of opposites were seen at a recent dinner-dance. Two versions of the dominant black and white, alone or in combination, theme illustrated striking contrasts of silhouette. A model gown with gullness emanating from the knees combined black tulle with white tulle. Bands of the white tulle were applied to upper and lower extremes of the newly molded section.

Old Form of Church Service To Be Followed

The service in Zion Presbyterian Church tomorrow evening will be of special interest, as it will be a repetition in part of the service conducted in the First Presbyterian Church of Chatham, Ontario a few months ago, signaling the 300th anniversary of the National Covenant of the Scotch Kirk. The service will be conducted by a precentor according to the form familiar to early members of the denomination. Rev. Mr. Scott Fulton, D.D., former pastor of Zion Church who is supplying the pulpit this month, is conducting tomorrow evening's special service at the request of the congregation.

Following the old time custom the organ will not be used except during the chanting of a solo by Mrs. A. H. Roper entitled "My Ain Country." The old Psalms including the 100th and 23rd, will be sung, and the singing will be led by a precentor, the choir sitting with the congregation and assisting in the singing. The congregation will stand during prayer and remain seated during the singing. The collection will be taken up by means of the old bag-handled boxes instead of the plates.

300th Anniversary The signing of the Scottish covenant is referred to in the following article which has been supplied by Rev. Dr. Fulton:

During this year the Presbyterian Church throughout the world is celebrating the three hundredth anniversary of the signing of the National Covenant for on the 25th day of February, 1638, in the churchyard of Greyfriars in Edinburgh, the covenant was signed, it is estimated, by some sixty thousand persons. Virtually the whole of Scotland signed it; the two outstanding exceptions being St. Andrews and Aberdeen.

By the signing of this covenant Scotland declared its fixed determination to worship God in its own way—the Presbyterian form of worship. Today this historic document can be seen carefully guarded in Holywell Palace, Edinburgh. And a very interesting occupation it is to pick out those who signed with their blood and others who wrote "until death" after their signatures.

Has Seen Covenant The writer was privileged to see this document, and will not forget the thrill it gave him to go through the names of the signatories, and to call up the events so intimately associated with them during those stern and troublous times in Scotland. Though not knowing one word of Gaelic, the writer has many times worshipped in churches in the Highlands of Scotland where the service was conducted entirely in this wonderfully expressive language. What intense earnestness and devout reverence characterized the whole service? What fervour animated the singing of the old psalms? No choir was there. No aid of musical instrument. Led by a precentor who would read the line, the psalm would be taken up by the congregation; and what it lacked in musical fitness was more than made up by the fervour with which it was rendered. No one having heard it could ever forget; and no one who ever looked into the upturned faces could erase from their memory the expressions of devotion and reverence which these people brought into their worship.

GYRO DANCE AT BEACH GROVE INN MONDAY Al Blanchard's Orchestra Spot Tickets 50c each (tax extra) It's a Gyro Dance

The same was true of services conducted in English. Little children caught the spirit of the older worshippers; and one had thus round the secret of this stern man had understood to the shedding of their blood and every attempt to interfere in anyway with their method of worshipping God.

An Iron Creed They had an iron creed, but it made iron men; and everything in the world that was political life was subordinate to their religious convictions, and the form of worship in which they expressed these convictions, it was on this stern man that the Scotch character that the Scotch Union of English and Scotland nearly perished. England had its Episcopacy but Scotland would have none of it; and finally Elizabeth had to give into the Scotch insistence on its own form of Church Government. Nothing would be tolerated that infringed that right.

Nowhere were the tenets of their faith and belief more zealously inculcated than in their homes and here, more than in any other sphere, was Scottish character moulded. The writer has been privileged to spend many Sabbaths in the Highland Scottish homes, and the memory of them will never fade. After dinner the family would be gathered into the living room. It was a solemn occasion. Here were fervently sung such psalms as "I to the hills will lift mine eyes." "O happy is the man who hears instruction's warning voice." This was followed by the reading of Scripture and prayer. During this prayer one was made abruptly conscious of the "Sovereignty of God."

Sovereignty of God This doctrine was more emphasized than any other and it is little wonder that the Scottish character, overshadowed by this conception of God's Sovereignty, should sternly refuse to obey anything that even seemed to rob God of His rightful place in the nation's life. They feared God and scorned a lie. Following the prayer he came the catechising. Here they were catechised in the Scriptures and Shorter Catechism. It was a heart searching hour, free from every trace of levity and carelessness, and the family could never erase the lessons of those Sabbaths. Nor would they if they could. Such was the source from which Scotland drew its strength in stern hours and in trouble. Is not this then a call to the old puritan attitude to God and His worship? Surely here is the answer and the remedy to much that we deplore to-day in our home, social, political and religious life.

At the morning service Dr. Fulton will preach from John Knox's great text as found in St. John 17:3. This will serve as a preparation for this special evening service.
