An Adventure In Years

BY CAROLYN BEECHER

Chapter XL

"Oh, look!" Lenore's hand clung to Ned's arm. Directly in front of the machine a tiny girl stood with a dazed frightened expression on her face.

"After this ride Ned saw a good deal of Lenore Fleetwood. But often when with her his thoughts flew back to Sonia, and he thought of her as so splendid, so full of life and energy."

"Sonia cleverly led him to talk of what he did when away from her. He had not yet wholly recovered his health, and so had not taken up his work. Later he would open a studio. He discussed his plans with her."

Often Sonia spoke of Lenore. She knew—at least she thought she knew—that Ned was very much interested by the beautiful girl. It could be nothing else for, wealthy as her father was, Ned was tully as wealthy and had besides that indifference to money found in the young who have never known the need of it.

Occasionally he accompanied either Sonia or Lenore to church on Sunday morning. Both of them same desire to kiss Lenore that he had felt that day in the park. Then he would put out his hand and lay it over hers.

Often in his rooms at night he would sit before the fire thinking of Lenore. He would close his eyes and see her lovely girlish face, hear her laugh, her voice.

Lenore, Sonia's face would push Lenore's in the background. Sonia's voice that always caressed the ear, would make Lenore's indignant. He could only half see, half imagine her. Sonia was a pulsing presence, warm, comforting.

"Oh, God, give me back my youth!" Sonia prayed as she saw and heard. "But no hint of what she felt tinged her manner as she waited with Ned until both girls had joined them. She spoke naturally to them and then preceded them into the house, Ned and Lenore chatting animatedly together."

All through dinner and the dancing afterward Ned noticed that Sonia seemed to be watching him. Occasionally he surprised a look of something very like sadness in her face. She looked very charming in her blue velvet frock, cut low and showing her white neck and shoulders, her arms. When he smiled at her, her lip quivered as she smiled back at him.

Lenore also looked particularly lovely that night in a soft, foamy white dress just a bit open at the neck. When he smiled at her returned it in a comradely sort of a way that had just a tinge of possession in it—so Sonia, who was watching, thought.

Never had the weather god been kinder than the week of the house party. The sun shone brightly; even the clouds seemed more luminous, more joyful, as they floated lazily over the bueness of the sky.

Sonia had been so happy to think that she would be in the same house with Ned for a long seven days. Now, even after the first day, she was not quite so happy. She was afraid of herself, scornful of herself. How would she ever be able to disguise her feelings from him from these people?

She knew that she loved him with all the strength of her nature. She wanted to be unselfish for him; wanted him to have the best that life could give. Surely, feeling this way, she would have the strength to give him up. Yet she was afraid, horribly afraid.

When alone with him she compelled herself to talk of the weather; the different people at the party; inconsequential things when all she wanted was love him, and to know that he loved her.

She had seen again the glances Lenore exchanged with him; she had overheard him say to the girl: "Do you know that you are very sweet, very lovely?"

That night she wept bitterly as she stood at her window looking out at the twinkling stars, her heart cold with dread.

Ford Motor Company of Canada, Limited, Ford, Ontario

Wherever you go—Ford Service

THE immense output of cars from the Canadian Ford factory permits the adoption of expensive time-saving machinery that would not be economical in factories with smaller production.

This saving of time is a factor in the low price for Ford high quality.

A giant milling machine finishes in one operation the sides and bottoms of ten cylinder castings, forty cylinders in all. The cylinder heads are machined by a similar miller with one man and a helper operating it. Factories with smaller output use for each cylinder block operation a separate machine with its own mechanic, thus adding to the cost of higher priced cars.

Many small-output factories farm out their gear cutting. Ford gears are cut by expensive automatic machines in our own factory, six machines being operated by one man, resulting not only in economy of operation but in perfection of work reflected in the smooth running of your Ford car.

Ford time-saving machinery, of which those above mentioned are typical examples, enable us to produce a car of the highest quality at a low price.
