SAD MOMENTS ON THE GREEN

Many of the saddest moments of the golfer's life, writes an enthusiast who signs himself "Straight Drive," are experienced upon the putting greens on those occasions when it seems impossible to get the ball to go toward the hole. I have seen players who have devoted years to practice at the game as helpless as a baby when it came to getting the ball close to the hole on the approach putt. Many writers have gone on record as of the opinion that putting is purely a matter of mental calculation and judgment, while others think that it is a matter of eyesight. So far as I have observed, after having seen nearly all the leading players of the country in action, it is a combination of both. Headwork, judgment, and nerve enter into the stroke in gauging the distance to be covered and calculating the line to the hole, while the matter of aiming so as to accurately catch the back of the cup is one where the man with the better eyesight must prevail.

The question of distance is nicely solved by many players, who carefully walk up to the hole apparently on the lookout for irregularities and the line, but who accurately pace off the exact distance to be made on the stroke and examine the texture of the turf. They have learned by hard practice how much force to apply for five yards, for ten yards, and further under various conditions, and can usually be depended on to get up to the hole, giving the ball a chance to go down if it reaches the lip of the cup.
