The Third Warning

A Mystery Love Story

By Augustus Muir

I don't know how George felt with that beam directed on the draperies that were our sole protection against either the crash of a loaded egeel or a revolver bullet; but for me at any rate it was a moment of tense and racking discomfort. Our only chance to escape his detection was to stand as motionless as statues. The slightest quiver, and his eye would leap upon the movement in the dazle of that remorseless beam. I did not dare to breathe. It was a matter only of waiting and trusting, by some wonderful fall of luck, we would pass unnoted in the room. The light ran up and down. He must have been standing in the doorway, taking a survey, and his eye located the window curtains where we stood hidden. Then the light was flicked away to more important objects. We were safe—for the moment! How long we were to remain in that beatific state depended on his next action. In the room through my curtain I could hear nothing. If he were moving about, he was achieving it with singular silence; which meant that he was no careless amateur at the job, and moreover he had come and shod and prepared for this expedition.

pigeonhole was treated in the same way: always the contents were stuffed back with a quick petulance. Here was indeed no ordinary housebreaker! There was some definite object in his search. What object? What other object than my own? A sudden thrill ran down my spine, and I sweated coldly. The leather case I had found: where was it? What had I done with it? Then I could have laughed harshly. For the case was in my hand, clutched against my side! In the excitement of the sudden intrusion I had held on to it unconsciously. I watched him exultantly as he went through the drawers, running his eye through the papers, only to pack them back in their places. I think he must have searched that cabinet from top to bottom in less than half the time I took and with that he was more careful and thorough. As he completed the last drawer, and stood up as if puzzled, I knew for certain he had come for the leather case I was pressing safely against my side. He stood stood thus for a while, looking carefully over the cabinet on every side, as if to hunt for a secret receptacle. Then he closed the drawers, shut down the lid, and kneeling on the floor put his hand underneath. Not satisfied apparently, he opened the lid again and pulled out the bottom drawer and set it beside him on the floor, exporing inside the cabinet with his torch. He seemed positive it should contain something which he had not found. Then, as I thought, with great reluctance he looked it up, bundled the clothes about it as he had found them, and drew the chintz hangings with a low grunt of satisfaction. I withdrew my head in to the concealing folds of the curtain and waited in trepidation for his next move. If it were his intention to search the room for what he had failed to find in the cabinet, it was certain he would stumble upon us.

Again there fell a silence in the room. It was not that the curtain muffled the sounds, but that his
