Hazy About Right Or Wrong (Rev. Dr. Hugh Black)

We have to apply our Christian principle of tolerance in every region of life. This does not mean that we give up principle for the sake of peace, that we weakly assent to what we believe evil. Nor does it mean that we are neutral in an issue. Every virtue can easily slip over into a vice, and this is perhaps especially true of tolerance.

Real tolerance is born of love and shows itself in the desire to consider others, to be open-minded to the opinions of others, to be kind in all our dealings with others, and to be generous in our estimates of others. But this generosity and good-will can easily become soft complacency. When a moral issue is drawn, tolerance can spend all its time in straddling the line.

It can become a mood of easy-going concession, and that very soon breeds indifference. It is not hard to be tolerant if you do not care one way or the other. If you are hazy about right and wrong some men are praised for their breadth of view and their wide tolerance of differing opinions, who should be blamed for having no opinions to speak of.

Some tolerance is even worse, a cynical acceptance of what is. All cats are grey in the dark of night, there are no clean-cut lines, and all colours shade into dull grey. It is sometimes the superior attitude of the mere spectator, who looks on from a safe distance as if he could have no part in it. He looks at it as from a height, and smiles at the antics of men, Lord, what fools the mortals be! He has no real principles, no standards of judgment, no concern one way or the other. That is not tolerance, but besotted indifference.

True tolerance exists only among men who are passionately convinced, but have such a high thought of truth that they care not claim its mantle for themselves. They will not sully its beauty by resort to force or violence. Moral ends cannot be advanced by immoral means. They look instinctively for truth that is deeper than surface compromise. They also know that truth is larger than can be comprehended by any one mind or any one group. It takes all sorts of people to make the world. It is in addition to having moral materials machine-made, standardized products, we had all human character made to pattern. It would be a poorer world. We might be richer in goods, motor cars and the rest, but we would be poorer in culture, and civilization would cease.

Is it too much to look for a state of society where reason and law would prevail, where brute force was not the sole weapon of conviction, where different types of life and even different forms of government could exist in reason, in peace and amity?
The loyalty of Scotsmen to Scotland, of Canadians to Canada, of Australians to Australia, does not weaken its loyalty to the British Empire. It enriches the real unity of the Empire. Jewish loyalty to their race and religion will not make them less loyal citizens of the nation of which they are citizens. This is the basis of the condemnation which the outside world pronounces on the Nazi persecution of the Jew as such.

No one would question the German right to punish Jews who were criminal, or disloyal, but the wholesale persecution of Jews as Jews is a policy against which the conscience of the world is revolted. British and American Jews are as loyal to their several countries as any section of the community. We feel that Hitler's anti-Semitic campaign is the world's disgrace. It is a crime against the Christian conscience and an outrage to common sense.
The Christian faith gives the whole theory of the absolute state the lie—and must, unless it forgets Calvary. The two ideals come to deathgrrips. Indeed, this delimitation of the state which means the delimitation of force—whether in the name of the Lord or in the name of the Anti-Christ, the complete denial of all for which Jesus lived and for which He died. The delimitation of the state, the tearing of the all-sufficient ties which bind the individual to his fellow-men, the destruction of all personal values, is the enemy of man's soul and of the whole Christian ideal. I am no prophet nor prophet's son, but I will predict that the truth is deeper than surface compromise. They also know that truth is larger than can be comprehended by any one mind or any one group. It takes all sorts of people to

ISLAND BORN ARTIST—Believed to be the first time that an American illustrator has attained recognition in a national magazine, the work of Miss Ruth Ives is given a prominent place in the March issue of Pictorial Review, on the stands today. Eight colored pen and ink illustrations and the full cover illustrations of the magazine's full-length novel of the month, "The Country Kitchen" by Della T. Lutes, are the work of Miss Ives. The young artist, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. B. B. Ives of 407 East North Street, was graduated from Anaheim high school in 1932 and went on to Chouinard art school in Los Angeles for three years, winning a scholarship at that institution. Following her graduation she went to New York where she has since done free lance illustration. (The above clipping from a paper in Anaheim, California, was received from Mr. T. Arthur Dawson, at present in St. Petersburg, Florida. Miss Ives' young artist daughter of one of my old school boy chums... a former Tryon boy and his daughter, Ruth received part of her education in the city of God, under the tutelage of Miss Jessie MacVetie. The Ives family have resided in California for quite a number of years.)

NOW IT CAN BE TOLD—THORNTON RIPS BACK CURTAIN ON LIMA CONFERENCE SPYING

BY WILLIS THORNTON NEA Service Staff Correspondent
Now that the political and economic implications of the Pan-American conference at Lima have been pretty thoroughly discussed, the behind-the-scenes story of the experiences of delegates and correspondents in surroundings of suspicion, espionage and snooping detectives can well be told.
The military display, the pomp and ceremony with which the conference opened was mildly thrilling to most of the visitors. But even before the grand opening, it was perfectly clear there were peculiar goings-on.
Newspapermen were approached by Peruvians with hints that Haya de la Torre, fugitive leader of Peru's suppressed Aprista opposition movement, might be approached for interviews. One such attaché of the conference staff slyly produced Aprista literature, but correspondents rapidly lost interest in him when they compared notes and found that the same fellow had attended several recent Pan-American conferences, always in a capacity attached to the Peruvian government, and always under a different name.

FRAYED NERVES
Probably it can not be proved either way, but by this time an atmosphere of discomfort and resentment was spreading widely through delegates and newspapermen. Many nervously searched their hotel rooms for dictaphones they were convinced would be found. None were found, but one correspondent was cut off several times while dictating stories to New York, always at a point where the text might have been interpreted as critical of the Peruvian government.
Aprista news sheets, outlining the plight of 4000 alleged political prisoners in Peruvian jails, who were said to be staging a hunger strike to draw attention of the conference, were shoved under hotel room doors. (The government insists there are fewer than 400 such prisoners, all arrested for definite illegal acts.)
About this time, cavalrymen armed with carbines appeared in every street leading to the conference hall, obviously to head off any possible political demonstration aimed at impressing delegates. A parade of 24 tanks rumbled down the main street to the palace grounds. Trucks filled with soldiers in full field equipment buzzed through the streets, and police in suburban sections wore steel helmets and grenade belts instead of formal police uniform of downtown traffic officers.

HE AND HIS SHADOW
One attaché of the American delegation remained to write late in one of the delegation's offices in the hotel. He sat alone in a corner of the office. While he sat there a man entered the room and began rifling through papers in desk drawers. Challenged by the American, he mumbled something about wanting to leave a note for one of the secretaries, and dozed out the door.
The head of one delegation grew tired of being shadowed. One day when he stopped in a restaurant door outside, he noticed a man moving heaven and earth to prevent reporters or left-minded delegates from getting in touch with radical opposition leaders or investigating local political conditions. 2-3 forces were made to find out in advance the position of many delegates, and thus affect the course of the conference. 3-The resulting atmosphere of official suspicion and spying almost succeeded in nullifying the efforts of a naturally cordial and well-wishing people to entertain their international guests.

AMERICAN CONFERENCE AT LIMA delirated peace and good-will, truck-loads of Peruvian soldiers like these shown unloading in front of the national palace, whirled through the streets.
