Three Men For Egypt

CHAPTER I

Eye Of A Wedding

"I'm so glad we chose the blue carpet Kit, green wouldn't really have suited the room."

"Or your eyes—that blue matches them quite nicely, as well as a mere carpet could," Kit Carson said, and Kay laughed softly.

"You silly! Someone will hear you."

"Don't care." The young man's voice fell to a whisper. "Kay, is it really true that we'll be married in three days, or am I dreaming?"

"It's—true" Kay was not laughing now. She spoke with a little catch in her breath and in the darkness her blue eyes widened.

Across the screen, advertisements were passing in a steady stream. But Kay Hellyar did not see those gaudily-colored pictures. She was looking at something very different a cottage on the outskirts of the town, their cottage. The blue carpet was already down over the boards which Kit had stained; in the sunny windows hung the curtains made by Kay.

In imagination, the girl went from room to room, into the little yellow-and-green kitchen, into the bedroom, white and grey, with touches of deep rose in carpet and curtains, into that other upstairs room, which now stood empty, glorified by the name of spare room, at present. But hope whispered behind the words of a time when it could no longer be spared. Kay saw it white-painted, with cheerful beasts and birds running in a dado all round, just high enough to be seen by baby eyes, touched by baby fingers.

She gave a long sigh, and Kit turned quickly.

"Dearest, you're happy, aren't you—there's nothing the matter?" he asked anxiously.

"Nothing the matter in all the whole world, happier than I imagined it possible to be. Terribly happy, Kit, so happy that it frightens me!"

"Darling!" he laughed.

"It does," Kay repeated. "I'm afraid that it's too miraculously wonderful to last."

"Our love, d'you mean?"

"No,—no!" The girl's whisper was so emphatic that Kit laughed again. "Our love,—that's for always, whatever happens. It's only happiness that I'm afraid of,—this wonderful happiness I'm frightened to touch it, for fear the petals might drop off like a perfect rose—"

"Silly child!" the big hand closed over the smaller one protectively. "So long as we have love and each other we must be happy. That's all that matters."

"Of course it is," she drew closer to him. "Only—well, I can't always forget—quite."

"Darling, you know I understand but I'll make you forget you were ever hurt," he whispered back. "Wipe it out like—like that!"

He ended with a laugh, as the last advertisement flickered away, and the white square of light shone blank for an instant, before huge letters shaped themselves.

"Nearer to our Hearts Desire: a Climax Picture—"

The first scene is a riverside garden. "Seems to something interesting going on," Kit remarked. "Gallant rescue of heroine by hero from a watery grave eh?"

Kay turned her head mechanically towards the screen. An overturned boat and the dripping figure of the maiden's companion in the riverside garden, although the heroine herself looked marvellously fresh and dry. There was another too, obviously the hero-rescuer tall, slim his back turned towards the audience.

"What would happen if the villain rescued the girl instead of the hero?" speculated Kit. "Rather upsetting to the story, yet easily possible in real life."

"But films aren't real life!" Kay declared and broke off with a gasp.

The tall man had turned, throwing back his head with a little defiant gesture and a gay laugh. To Kay, he seemed to be staring straight at her, and she stared back into those handsome eyes, her own widening with terror and blank amazement and disbelief.

For she knew that face and figure, that laugh, those eyes which mocked the movement of the head every gesture, every glance, as though they had been branded on her heart. As they had—Heaven knew!

For this actor on the screen was her dead husband, Rafe Hellyar.

handsome and fascinating enough to turn the head of a far older, wiser woman, from the first, life with Rafe Hellyar had been misery unspokeable.

In four years of married life the only bearable intervals were those when Hellyar was away. Yet Kay realized now that it might have been far worse, if Rafe had not killed her love for him so very quickly; as a very completely.

Somehow she toughed on, earning enough to keep herself by secretarial work since Rafe gave her practically nothing.

Then, after an occasion on which her husband had been away longer than usual a man whom she knew by name as a friend of his came bringing newspapers which contained in print what he told her. He had been with Hellyar in South America; it was an affair of a brawl in a game-house, and Rafe had been shot and killed instantaneously.

This man, Jack Borden, had identified the body, given evidence at the inquest, brought the dead man's possessions to his widow, a cigarette, a pencil, sleeve-links objects which Kay identified in dry-eyed silence.

Ellen's Diary

I asked, being accustomed to such wanderers though not so much during or since the war years "Well to tell you the truth ma'am. I may belong anywhere, so many places I've been. I work here or there, wherever I find it—in the woods, or grading potatoes. I met your man down the road. He told me to stop by and feed the mare—and hungry she is. Feed is pretty scarce the year, yes, it is scarce. But you people here have a-plenty." "Plenty!" I repeated recalling James' odd forecasts to the contrary "oh, no, barely enough to see the things through!" He laughed and a laugh is a transforming gesture wherever one finds it, even on the face of a wanderer, akin I think to one of God's sparrows that without sheltering roof or home are counted. "Indeed and there's plenty, ma'am—and I'm thinking there'll be some left over!"

In the quiet snow-fall which inclined to rain today there was neither thrashing nor going to the wood-chopping. James knew yesterday we were due for a change. Just by the look of the day and at night there was the circle around the moon holding within its well defined bounds, a star. I think he would have been well content to spend his minutes of leisure this afternoon indoors in the comfort of his old armchair if Jock—always extremely industrious—had not suggested that this was the very time "to take that kitchen pump up to see what's wrong with it." One day lately it had suddenly refused to function. In no time Jock was back with wrenches. Rob came too, and a handyman neighbor of his, Karolyn's, well and Jamie and the small fellow and altogether we had a fine afternoon at the pump-lifting. The head of the pump has been dismantled for the time and some of the pipe has been withdrawn from the cellar leaving an opening in the kitchen floor which allowed curious small folk a fearsome view of the dim unknown depths below.

Grand-daughter and Karolyn's younger son advanced towards the place cautiously to peer down into the darkness then turn away perplexed. Tabby ascending there now by hook and by cook, managing the climb successfully comes now before the fire to smooth down her ruffled fur and make up her face for our company. Mr. C. Ho in the rocking chair, though in lessened quarters due to something over which at this season the males have little control even in their own castles, chats with James. James apologizes for the cramped space. "It's those mat frames that Ellen's got stuck here these days—I'll be glad when she's done of them!" Then "Not much move in potatoes now" James observes. "No" agrees Mr. C. "things are at a standstill now, but business will likely brighten up once March comes in." "Once March comes in!" I say and remember how near is this month to dying.

Until tomorrow—Diary—Good night.
