Happy-Go-Lucky

By Mrs. Harry Fugh Smith

The new car was a wonder on hills and it could throttle down to nothing on a long incline and speed up to sixty in less than a minute. Martin enthusiastically demonstrated all its paces. In the process they went much farther than they intended. Suddenly it was quite dark and they were thirty miles from home. "I bet you're starved," said Martin condescendingly. "I do feel a bit empty," Barbara confessed.

Martin looked embarrassed. "There's a roadhouse about a mile farther along where they have grand chicken dinners." "Is there?" Martin flushed. "If Tony wouldn't object, Barbara, I'd love to take you to dinner. It would be like old times."

"Why should Tony object?" asked Barbara, her voice tinged with acid. "I think he and Gloria Havenner have had dinner together every night this week, either at her house or on the set." Martin frowned. "So I heard," he muttered.

Barbara flinched. She supposed everybody in town was saying, "I told you so."

It was cool at the roadhouse. They had a table facing the river. There was a little breeze, sweet with clover hay. The chicken was delicious. She enjoyed talking to Martin, too. At least he did not talk down to her. "You have the levellest head of any woman I know," he insisted.

His attitude was balm to Barbara's injured feelings. Tony's gang and Gloria Havenner had patronized her brains.

"This has done me a lot of good," said Martin when he let her out at her door at nine o'clock. "I wish we could do it again some time."

Barbara glanced up at the darkened windows of the flat. It would be midnight at least before Tony came home, probably later. For they were having a dress rehearsal. There had been no harm in her killing a part of the time with an old friend, Barbara told herself defiantly. Anyway, Tony had more or less asked for it. "Why not?" she murmured.

Martin's face lighted up.

XV

There were to be two performances of Tony's play, on Friday and Saturday nights. It was the latter at which Pinkney Law was expected. Barbara sat through the first with her heart sinking lower and lower. Nothing quite came off. The dialogue missed fire at all the big moments, the action sagged. In spite of the splatter of applause she thought it was a dismal failure. Tony thought so, too. She knew that the instant she caught sight of him. "Well," he said, trying to grin. "Of all the flops!"

All the bitterness which Barbara had been nursing vanished at the look in Tony's eyes. She could not remember why she had ever felt resentful toward him. She only wanted to comfort him, but it was Gloria Havenner who comforted Tony.

"Don't be silly," she snapped. "Of course everything went wrong tonight. It was nothing more than a dress rehearsal. Wait till Law is in the audience."

She made Tony go home with her and she mixed him a stiff drink and talked him out of his depression. Barbara was alone, but she might as well not have been. By the time she and Tony reached the flat, he was blithe and exuberant as ever.

He was very tired and the drink had made him sleepy. He began throwing off his clothes. He had tumbled into bed before Barbara finished creaming her face. She thought he was asleep when she crawled in beside her, but he stirred and put his arm drowsily about her.

"The crowd tried to take me to a ribbing today," he murmured. "They said that you went driving with Martin Fagg the other night and had dinner with him out in the country. Wanda swore she saw you." Tony chuckled. "As if I'd fall for a yarn like that!"

Barbara stiffened. "It wasn't a yarn, Tony. I did go driving with Martin and we did have dinner together. It was a very good dinner too. What do you expect me to do? Sit here in this little dump night after night and swelter while you and Gloria Havenner go round and round?"

Tony did not speak for a moment and Barbara held her breath, then he laughed sleepily. "It's all right with me sugar, if it is with you," he said. The next moment he was asleep. Barbara listened to his regular breathing and sighed with exasperation. She had to admit to herself that she had tried to pay Tony back in his own coin and failed.

She was still in her manner the next morning. Tony, on the other hand, was extremely gay. "Cat got your tongue again, Mrs. Blake?" Tony asked with a teasing smile. "My tongue's all right," she snapped. "So what?"

Tony laughed and pinched her cheek. "See you tonight."

Barbara shrugged her shoulders. "After you've seen everybody else."

Tony grinned at her. "You aren't in the world's best humor, are you, sugar?"

"Not that you give a darn," muttered Barbara.

"I wouldn't say that," laughed Tony, and went off whistling.

Barbara put in a miserable day. She had let her temper get the better of her, and she was sorry. She did not know why she felt so cross with everyone and everything lately. Martin Fagg came in while she was having lunch and started to sit down with her, but she told him in an acid voice that she preferred to be alone. Martin looked hurt and Barbara tried to smile.

"I'm sort of out of sorts today, Martin, think nothing of it," she said.

She wished she could go home, but she had her work to do, and she had agreed to get a story together for Tony because he wanted to put in the afternoon at the theater, drilling Hank on some new gags they had thought up.

She felt abused when she sat down at her typewriter. Her head ached and black spots kept jumping before her eyes. She hoped that she was not really going to be ill. She started to telephone Tony and ask him to take her home, but on this day of all days he would not want to be bothered.

By the time she arrived at the theater that night, she had again worked herself into a resentful frame of mind.
