(By Thornton W. Burgess)

There are times when what you see You will doubt can truly be. —Old Mother Nature.

Little Kid Surefoot, small son of Billy and Nanny Surefoot of the Mountain Goats who live on the High Mountains of the Far West, had a queer but wonderful feeling. Little as he was, and he was very small, for he was very young, he had just done something that Buster Bear's big cousin, Old Grizzly, didn't dare try to do. He had climbed from rock to rock and tiny ledge to tiny ledge along the face of a cliff where a single misstep would have meant a fall to cruel rocks far below. He hadn't been the least bit afraid of falling. Behind him he had left the great hungry bear who had hoped to catch him, but didn't dare even try to climb after him, and was snarling in disappointment as he looked longingly after Little Kid Surefoot who dared do what no bear would think of trying.

"I'm not afraid of that fellow any more. He'll never catch me," boasted Little Kid. He joined his mother and father on a ledge where they had waited for him. Nanny shook her head. "Yes, you will do the part if you are not afraid and he will surely eat you for his dinner. I am afraid of him. Your father is afraid of him. We always have been and we always will be. But we are not foolishly afraid, just afraid enough to try to always be near a place where we can climb out of his reach. Now you know what a blessing your feet are."

Little Kid looked down at his small hooved feet admiringly. They hadn't always been there. He had the lovely feeling that they never would. He said so. "They won't if you look carefully where you are going and make sure each time just where you are stepping or jumping. A loose stone may mean a slip and a fall, so watch your step. Your feet will do the part if your eyes do their part. Use your eyes and trust your feet, and you will live to be as big and wonderful as your father," said Nanny.

"Will I have big horns on my head like his?" asked Little Kid. A loud snort made them look up to a ledge above them, near enough for any one on it to have overheard them. The snort was repeated. Some one was on that ledge. He was looking down at them. He was a stranger to the small Goats who have never seen any one like him before. "Those things may be horns but they certainly are not big. If I couldn't have bigger horns than those I would rather have none at all," declared the stranger. He was looking disdainfully at Billy Surefoot's shiny, black, sharp-pointed, slender horns and curved back a foot long and curved back a very little. Nanny also wore a pair but they were smaller. Little Kid Surefoot stared at the stranger and his eyes looked as if they might pop right out of his head. Yes, sir, they did so. Was he dreaming? Could there possibly be such great horns as this stranger wore on his head. And such queer horns! Instead of being straight or nearly so, they

One letter simply stands for another. In this example A is used for the three L's, X for the two O's, etc. Single letters, apostrophes, the length and formation of the words are all hints. Each day the code letters are different.

East-West were decidedly out-manuevered in this bidding. Five clubs would have been cold, and even with a double-dummy opening lead, five clubs could not have been beaten more than one trick.

Actually, West led the spade five, and after East had taken the ace, he was almost through. He returned the diamond king. South won, quickly drew trumps, then ruffed to the heart queen. A heart went off the spade queen, and the contract was safe.

East was emphatic in saying that his double of five clubs called for an "unnatural" opening. He was not quite right about this — he must have been thinking about the double of a slam contract, would play low from dummy. East could ruff, as he was so anxious to do, but that would not break the contract. If he returned a diamond—his best lead — South would win, draw East's last trump, then double-finesse the hearts. This would let him discard his singleton spade. Or if East, after ruffing, cashed the spade ace, declarer would discard one diamond and his other low diamond on dummy's long heart, after taking the same double finesse.

True, if West could have guessed to open the heart king or jack — remarkable choices!—East would have obtained his cherished one-trick set of five clubs!
