Use the Milk that Whips

Carnation "Creams" Coffee at Half Price

Try Carnation in coffee and taste why millions prefer it to cream. Gives creamier color, smoother, richer flavor. Costs half as much as lightest cream.

Just good whole milk evaporated to double richness—nothing removed but water.

Use it undiluted in place of cream... diluted with an equal amount of water for any milk use.

Carnation gives—extra smoothness, extra rich flavor, extra nourishment.

BOTH OVER 21

By Samuel Hopkins Adams

Mr. Kane looked shocked. A little too obviously shocked, had his companion analyzed his expression. "You don't mean that she isn't a good little girl?" he inquired in pained accents.

"Nothing like that," replied Miss Matilda hastily. "I only say—be careful!"

"I will," he promised.

"Do you mind if I ask you something quite personal?"

"Shoot."

"When you're famous and—sought after, you won't ever quite forget this little drink we're having, will you. You see, it's my first cocktail. And I'd like to remember it always," said Miss Matilda sentimentally.

"What's that about being famous?" demanded the young man, puzzled.

"This is as near as I ever expect to get to fame, and I don't want any more of it. How am I supposed to rate future glory?"

"You needn't tell me anything that you don't want to," said Miss Matilda generously. "But I know what is coming to you."

"So do I. Another cocktail. You'll join me?"

"Certainly," said Miss Matilda. The second was even more satisfactory than the first. It engendered a reluctance to leave the entrancing environment of the ship until the last possible moment. People sometimes went back on the pilot boat.

Why shouldn't she. Thus she might find opportunity to supervise the re-approachment of the two young people. First, though, Matilda must be warned about Simms Waring.

Excusing herself to Stateroom K, where Matilda was engaged in restoring her distended features to their original symmetry. "Mac! I thought you'd gone ashore."

"What's the hurry?"

"You've been drinking, Matilda McCabe."

"Only two cocktails. They were grand. Let's have another."

"There wouldn't be time."

"Like this boat," sighed the secretary. "I wish I were going along. Matilda, I've just seen Simms Waring. He's on the pier."

"What brings him here? Is he after me, do you think?"

Miss Matilda looked guilty. "I'm afraid I left some papers in my office. In fact, I'm sure I did. If anyone found them, they'd know."

"Oh, Mac! The two conspirators gazed at each other in bleak foreboding. A knock at the door stiffened them.

"Could I speak to Miss M. McCabe?" Silently motioning the girl back, the legitimate owner of the name opened the door. A uniformed official said courteously: "Might I trouble you to come to the superintendent's office? A slight formality about your luggage."

The secretary followed down the gangplank, across the pier, into a small room. She did not see Simms Waring as she passed him; he had hastily turned aside. She did not see Tillman L. Hill who was hiding in another office. Outside a whistle whistled hoarsely. She went to the door. It was locked. An official announcement came to her ears, "She's casting off, sir."

Miss Matilda beat upon the panel. A key clicked. Tillman L. Hill stood before her, a propitiatory smile on his countenance. "Sorry, Matilda," he began. "Good God! It's you."

"Good morning, Mr. Hill," returned the secretary with all the geniality induced by two cocktails. "You've caught the wrong canary."

At the last possible moment Simms Waring, brandishing a pass, dashed aboard. A tall, suave, and elegantly garbed man accosted him. "How are you, Mr. Waring? Sailing with us? Remember me. Aymon's the name."

"No. Yes. Where's taternoon K?"

"Second deck up," the professional dancer's eyes narrowed with speculation.

As a measure of precaution Matilda had bolted her door after Miss Matilda's exit. Hearing a cautious rapping she assumed that her companion had returned, and opened.

"Simms!"

"May I come in?"

"You certainly may not. Get off, quick before the ship starts."

"I've come to get you."

"Don't be silly."

"It's important."

So distraught did he appear that she became alarmed. "What is it, Simms? Has anything happened?"

"I'll tell you when we get ashore."

"I'm not going ashore unless you tell me."

"You've got to, Matilda." In his urgency he made a grab for her arm. She evaded him and would have slammed the door but for the deft interposition of his foot. There was a struggle. The disturbance came to the ears of Mr. Metzger who emerged into the passageway.

"What's up?" he asked mildly. Simms whirled on him. "Who are you?"

"My name is Mr. Metzger. If you have business with this lady—"

"I have."

"He hasn't," denied the girl. Mr. Metzger stepped forward. You'll have to come away from that lady's door."

"Will I? I'll show you!" shouted the athlete with a mighty heave and sent the other through the ceiling and out on deck. Picking himself up, the Lex-Lohengrin representative made an undaunted re-entry only to be pitched out again.

Another door opened and Wallis Kane emerged in his shining regiment. "What's up, Metz?" he inquired.

"Lunatic," gasped the theater manager.

"Back to your cage, you white cockatoo," yelled Simms.

Ellen's Diary

less, there was nothing else to do but buy a new one, what then?"

Ours has come to that condition where she sings along blithely a spell to tune an answering chord in ones heart, until suddenly one is aware of a silence—a blank in the surroundings, that warns one a shadow has fallen where a few minutes ago all was bright. And presently the truck is withdrawn from the garage or slips away from its temporary quarters under a yard maple, and upon inquiry one learns "that confounded old binder won't tie the sheaves. She did it for a round or two, and then... She's broken that... Jock's gone to town for the extra! I've half a mind to go in and buy a new one—though there's a spell in her yet!" Then when the sun is beaming down mellowly and James is convinced the field of grain is already "shelling ripe" and days shorten, there is no question of buying. Instead it is always a concern, Can we? And how soon? And though there may be sighs and comparisons made later when one has had time to consider it, there is little thought at the moment over the price. Interests are centred on making progress at the work at hand. So it was with Rob yesterday. He must at all costs procure the replacement for the plant, in order to assure the return of the customary measure of comfort to the family and supply lights to the stables for the early and late choring, and water to the stock as well.

With the prospect of today's work, which had increased to a point that made it appear overwhelming to a lone farmer, help was brought in. "Do you think you could cater to an extra man for meals today?" Rob asked us at breakfast—questioned of one of whom James in his expansive moods is pleased to say, when checking over our virtues as a farmer's wife: "Well, that's one thing that never was any trouble to Ellen—she could always find food for one or indeed a number, of extra ones. But after all, it's only another plate or so!" We let the suggestion of Rob's query, which amounted to the poor old thing it's a shame to ask it of her, ride, and throughout the day managed to maintain our credits.

A smart, nice helper he was, this boy of a fellow we have seen grow up in the community. He is the head of a family now, though one can scarcely believe that enough years have flown, the parents of two little girls. It may be his genial smile that makes him a favorite in his home community and farther afield, but we fancy a contributing factor is his willingness to do a good turn for others. The smallest request is given the same attention as a more important one and any and all are done with a good heart. Some do a favor so grudgingly that immediately one regrets that circumstance had required one to ask it of them, but not this man, we have seen grow from a small lad, who seems to consider it not a chore, but a privilege to be of service to others.
