SUNDAY SERVICES HELD IN POOLROOM
WASKATENEAU, Alta., Sept. 11 (CP) Most Churches have their own distinguishing features. The Greek Catholic Parish in this small Alberta town 80 miles north-east of Edmonton is no exception. The congregation holds its services every Sunday in the town poolroom. While about 100 Greek Catholics take up seats placed between the various pool tables, Father Wyniak uses the pool table closest to the front of the hall for his pulpit. Sometimes when the "church" is crowded one churchgoer finds himself sitting in a barber chair that is a permanent fixture in the hall. The day after the church service the hall reverts to its original purpose — the home of the town's billiard addicts. The Greek Catholics have never had a church of their own and find it necessary to move into the poolroom. Next spring they hope to build their own place of worship.

The school teacher was asked to inquire as to how many would take advantage of the splendid offer the Red Cross offers in supplying fish oil capsules. It was motioned seconded that we send the organ to Charlottetown to have it repaired. It was suggested that we ask the help of the hall committee in arranging transportation of the organ was to Mrs. Jas. M. #### CHAPTER XXV

"I've never thought of not admitting it," said Eleanor. "Certainly, my dear, everyone thought it so courageous of you to have no false pride. And I think I should tell you, lest you misunderstand my making this plain, that I championed you from the very beginning."

"How obliging of you," said Eleanor. "My dear, with all my faults nobody can say I have not always tried to do my duty. And I'm sure you have such foolish, futile flaws, were they not, Eleanor?"

Eleanor smiled upon her with all politeness. "In my home, Cousin Sylvia, we gave very little attention to the dead except to see that they were properly buried."

Though baffled, Sylvia was not silenced. She pursued her subject. "I have told you all this, Eleanor dear, not to hurt you — should be very sad if I thought I had hurt you — but to make you understand that there has been certain, ah, unkind gossip of late."

Sylvia waited for Eleanor's reaction, but as Eleanor showed none Sylvia went on. "Oh, my dear, if you knew how it pains me to tell you — for there have been those malicious enough to say that a man cannot be condemned for returning to his own people. How can anyone be so cruel? How can anyone have such foolish, futile interest in the concerns of others, talking, tattling, injuring —" she paused dramatically.

With a blank smile on her face, Eleanor was thinking, "won't give her the satisfaction of seeing the writhe, not if it kills me. She listened stolidly.

"But don't you understand what I mean?" Sylvia was pleading. Eleanor continued to smile, and shook her head. "I'm quite in the dark, Cousin Sylvia. Won't you have another cup of coffee?"

Sylvia declined. She talked ahead in her expressionless voice, probing, hinting, watching. Eleanor remained obdurate. "The wife is all right, but the husband is a little better than an outsider, don't you agree with me, someone related to Kester?"

"I thought nearly everybody in town was related to Kester."

"Yes, the family had many branches. But someone who has been intimate with the household all her life is certainly better than a remote relative, don't you think, when something has to be spoken of?"

"But what has to be spoken of?" Eleanor inquired. "My poor, innocent girl, can it be possible that you still don't understand?"

"Understand what, Cousin Sylvia?"

"Why, my dear, you cannot believe everyone doesn't know Kester is working at the Government cotton station, has been there for two months?"

"Why, of course, I thought everybody knew that. Why shouldn't they?"

"But, Eleanor, have you heard no whisper of anything further?"

"No whisper? What sort of whisper?"

"Oh, you poor woman, about Isabel Valcour."
