WOMAN'S AUXILIARY - The first devotional meeting for 1946 of the Women's Auxiliary Branch of St. Paul's Anglican Church was held on Tuesday afternoon. The new president Mrs. C. H. Colles presided. She welcomed all and asked for full cooperation for the coming year. The usual business was transacted, followed by the reading of a synopsis on the ground. The title of this book is "West of the Date-Line." It is a very interesting book, especially at this time as it deals with the countries in the South East Asia and the Pacific. Since Japanese have control over most of this area, it is very interesting to hear from the missionaries serving there. A social hour then followed, tea being served by the committee appointed.

Archbishop Spellman

"It's been a grand day, hasn't it, Dexter?" "Grand, hell! It would be perfect, Judy, if you'd promise me one thing."

"I haven't the least idea of putting you off again." It wasn't that Dexter wanted to marry you before he had had to take the nursing course. There was something inside of me. And I am going to marry you."

"When?" "Why in the spring, I suppose? Wouldn't that be as good a time as any?"

"No. I think Christmas would be a darn sight better."

"Well, I don't know, Jenny! I'll be back from Washington then and there's even a chance Jerome might get leave. The house will be ready by then. I'll be out trying to have a wedding there."

"Resigned" She looked away and Dexter watched her expression attentively, saying nothing more about a Christmas wedding just then. He and Judith Farman had been married for a long time, all their lives, and they had been sweethearts ever since they stopped being playmates; he recognized all her moods and he learned long before that all of them were not "mellow" by any means.

"There were many number of masculine hearts which still ached because of her willing absence from the world, even though Dexter was concerned, though for all his admiration he knew only too well that Judith was not as light-hearted as she seemed, really more than she was really as good as she was. Basically she was serious, though she was a good deal."

"One of the reasons they had always been so close was because of this basic gravity they possessed. But she was much more the stubborn of the two, and the other could be very stormy. Dexter was a peace-loving person, whose kindness showed itself in his plainness of speech. He desired nothing less than to stir up a storm at the end of a day, which as he and Judith knew, he had never done before. But he pushed his luck to the point of asking one more question."

He's a Pest You won't insist on going on with your nursing after we're married, will you, Judy?"

"I won't take any cases out of the hospital, with you, Jenny, and Jerome both so far away. Dad and Mom aren't unreasonable, but I don't see how I can have my time to do much nursing after I marry you. I think you'll keep me too busy cooking you up some nice little dinners to pass you to believe wives ought to obey their husbands a little, wishing she had not used the word 'cooking'." Although he was very fond of her, even more than he was extremely sensitive about the lameness which had kept him out of sports, first at the local high school and later at the University, and which more recently had been the cause of his rejection by the draft board.

He had broken his leg when he was a little boy, jumping from a high beam in the Farman's hay barn. He had been playing with Jerome and Jenny when he did so, and although Jerome had not actually dared him to take the leap, he himself had done so spontaneously and fearlessly and had betrayed his surprise at Dexter's hesitation.

There while Dexter was still standing uncertainly on the beam, Jenny had chanted "Fraid cat!" and Dexter had jumped. The accident had not been regarded as serious at first, so his leg had not been set as promptly as it should have been, and though later it had been broken and reset, this treatment had come too late; one leg had remained a little shorter than the other.

No Consolation Dexter had never found any consolation in the fact that he had been the best liked man on the campus, and now he found none in the fact that nearly all his neighbors believed there would not be a war anyway, and even if there were, Dexter Abbott would be much more useful where he was.

He not only ran his farm and mill with marked efficiency, but he was also a director of the bank, and the Master of the

NO SHORTAGE of Canadian Nurses in Armed Forces

(OTTAWA, Jan. 11 - (CP) - Lt.-Col. Dorothy I. MacRae, national-in-chief of the Nursing Sisters of the Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, said today that there is no shortage of nurses in the Canadian forces and that there were between 200 and 300 civilian nurses, eager to join the services, waiting to be called.

She was commenting on recent statements by Newfoundland and Ontario nursing corps officials that they were short of personnel.

"The Canadian service has never recruited and has never had a shortage, so that Canada's servicemen are receiving the finest nursing care in the world," she said.

Official figures show more than 3,700 nurses serving as Nursing Sisters in the Canadian armed forces.

The Royal Canadian Navy Nursing Service list 282, including 15 serving in Newfoundland and 21 in Scotland; the R. C. A. M. C. 3,041, of whom 2,069 are serving overseas, and the Royal Canadian Air Force 401, of whom 40 are serving overseas, including four in France.

There are 58 women doctors in the services—seven in the Navy, 40 in the Army, of whom six are overseas, and 11 in the Air Force.

Lodge's activities as these village understood and appreciated. It had never approved of the Farman's course in going to Norwich Military Academy, instead of Dartmouth, which was his college, apparently for no better reason than because he had been intrigued with the cadet's uniforms when they came to play football at Hanover. Now the village said "it served him right" because, as a reserve officer, he had been wrested from the Boston bank where he was doing so well, and sent to Fort Bragg, before the new defense program was half under way.

Except for his parents, and sisters and Dexter Abbott, no one even knew he was in the service, and as a first lieutenant instead of as a second lieutenant because he had served on Army paper work in Boston, nights, after his day's work was done.

Dexter was still thinking about his future, brother-in-law, and trying to do so without envy, when Judith put her face against his, effectively banishing all thoughts of Jerome. Dexter guessed the gesture was one of contrition rather than yearning. He knew she was very cold, and he had done in the past, and presently he leaned forward and twisted his reins under the dash board. Meanwhile the wife old horse plodded patiently on the hill without guidance, as he had done under the mill for a hundred years of time before.

ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife

tools and debris, the Minister called—not our present Minister, for this was the past year.

He made "port" stepping him and surely across the various obstacles. "I've often pondered the same question. But they were already on their way to the wood-chopping. I could hear Pard's sharp joyous bark."

Pard is a curious creature and has a whole scale of bark for the most part easily understood by us at Alderley. But this evening we were puzzled at his actions. He prowled between this house and the house across the lane barking and growling loudly, at intervals. Tonight his bark was not for one of the family nor to warn of approaching strangers. No cat or other animal invaded his precincts nor was there a tantalizing swift-moving plane overhead. It was Mr. Ewert, coming in after inspecting the dam who explained his behavior.

His youngsters on the pond" he said. Then Judy was off, skating along over a shoulder to join the party of girls and boys "from the corner" skating there. Again the skating was by lantern light. To music tonight, James called me to the door "only a minute now!" to hear the fetching strains of the mouth-organ and young voices singing on the still night air. Friday, school-cars can be forgotten, in the abandon of a night on the ice. Presently they came from their spots to change to other foot-gear and were soon off in the night, tired doubtless, but very happy. Pard barked them up the hill and out of sight and quiet once more settled over Alderley.

Judy has gone now "to do my Diary" she says. I hear James in the kitchen say, "I doubt I could stand on them now." Mr. Ewert's reply is so low I fail to catch it. He very quiet in the kitchen now. Time I would say for a cup of something.

Until tomorrow - Diary - Good night.

GREETINGS SENT From Overseas

Mrs. J. H. Bowness, North Tryon, P.E.I., has received the following letter from the Major of the platoon in which her husband is serving in Belgium: N. D. Hogg, Major, 80 Cdn. Gen. Tpl. Coy., 1st Dec. 44

Dear Mrs. Bowness—I bring you greetings from the 8th Gen. Tpl. Coy. RCASC. Do want you to know that we are getting along very well. All the officers, NCO's and privates have done a grand job under very difficult circumstances. The work has been trying and if the RCASC had not very much been called upon to deliver the goods over such long lines of communication. We are an integral part of a great fighting machine. Everyone who follows these lines of supply is proud of the part that the Corps plays. All ranks in a unit such as ours, has a plain and efficient operation. No one can be picked out as being more important than another for it must operate as a team. My duty is to place men in the job for which he is best suited, and this schedule is the best winter order of services. You are invited to be present and worship with us. Rev. A. E. Todd, Minister. 1-12-11.

I assure you that I have also tried to make things as comfortable as I possibly could for all ranks. We are all in the same surroundings and the good health and happiness of all has always been of prime importance. The best that I could do for you has always been stressed. It is a grand sight to see the 89th step out either on parade or for conveyance. They are smart. Clean living and good behaviour are expected and there have been very few instances where these rules have been broken. We try to be gentlemen. Attention to religion has always been encouraged but very seldom forced. I tell you these things because I feel that you are primarily interested in the welfare of your own people. Mail and parcels have always come through in good amounts. Checks on the receipt have been made and there have been very few instances of men not receiving regular news from home. You too, have been broken. We try to be gentlemen. Attention to religion has always been encouraged but very seldom forced.
