HOW A MAN MADE GOOD

Several years ago a young man walked into the office of the largest ivory and spice importing house in the United States. He was looking for a clerkship. In due course he was admitted to the presence of the senior partner. Now the senior partner had a curious way of testing a young man whose general appearance was promising. His plan was to offer something entirely unexpected—a chance to make good in a position that the applicant never expected. His decision was determined by the manner in which the applicant responded—whether or not he showed alertness to grasp the opportunity. In this instance the senior partner offered the young man the position of supercargo on a ship loaded with cotton goods to be sent to Madagascar within forty-eight hours. The young man hardly knew where Madagascar was, and he had almost no idea of the duties of a supercargo. But these considerations he swept aside for he saw his opportunity. He accepted the position with the young man went to Madagascar and sold the cotton goods to such advantage that he was appointed by cable the firm's agent in Zanzibar. It was the place of great responsibility. On his judgment depended the organization of caravans into Central Africa to search for ivory, the maintenance of friendly relations with Arab chiefs, including the famous Tippoo Tib, and the purchase of the annual Zanzibar clove supply for America. Zanzibar was then virtually the only clove-producing spot on the globe.

—Mr. B. R. Sharpe and Wife Summerside are spending their holidays at Pleasant Valley the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Sharpe, "Hillside Farm."

—The young man found the business of the firm disorganized because capable men could not be induced to stay in the deadly climate of Zanzibar. By careful living he preserved his health, and, thanks to his hard work, he was eventually gratified to see the name of his firm again rank high in that part of the world. But as years went by the natural longing to be called home grew within him. His success, however, was the very thing that seemed to defeat that object. His firm, expressing the complete confidence in him said not a word about his return on leave or permanently. And he, appreciating that confidence at its full worth, never hinted at either.

—Miss Grace Walsh, stenographer for the Steam Navigation crossed by the S. S. "Empress" Saturday morning for New Glasgow where she intends to spend her vacation.

At last came his opportunity and his reward. For three days Zanzibar was swept by a terrible hurricane. Much of the city was destroyed.

wreckage was piled up on the harbor beach, and nearly every three on the island was torn up by the roots. The last fact was the all-important one when the American agent crawled out from his shelter. The clove groves had been obliterated, and for three years there would not be another full clove crop in the world market. Clearly his duty was to get the news to his firm. But the cable between Zanzibar and Aden had been severed by the storm. If he waited for the mail steamer the news would become public, and of little advantage to the firm. Amid a still howling gale he crept down to the harbor front. There he saw that a single tramp steamer had kept afloat. The idea flashed into mind to charter her to carry his message to Aden, where telegraph connection could be made with New York. By his handkerchief tied to a stick he attracted the steamer's notice. Then by the marine signal code he contracted with the captain to run for Aden with a message to his firm of just two words: "Buy cloves."

Some days later the firm in New York received the message. To them its extreme brevity was sufficient in the light of the confidence they had come to place in their Zanzibar agent. They did not pause to question, but bought cloves in New York, London and Paris—all the cloves on the market. They had hardly completed the operation when news came of the terrible hurricane and the destruction of the Zanzibar clove groves. At once the price of cloves went up and up. Then the New York firm put up a brief message on the cable to their Zanzibar agent: "Come home." You can imagine with what joy he received it. He was no longer a young man when he re-entered the office to grasp the senior partner's hand and to accept the position of a general manager of their whole Oriental trade. Today he is a member of the firm. But when anyone asks him how he managed to reach the top of the ladder of success this is the story that he tells.

A TEETOTAL STORY.

Those who intend to follow the King's example and to become teetotalers during the war will find themselves in very distinguished company, for many famous men never touch intoxicating liquor of any kind. One of the most notable of these is Lord Charles Beresford, apropos of which fact there is an amusing story. Speaking to an audience of sailors some time ago, Lord Charles said: "I advise you to go in for sport instead of hard drinking. In my maturer years I have become a teetotaler myself." A short time afterwards, he received a letter from a dear old lady, who was absolutely unknown to him, in which she said that she had read the report of his speech in the paper and ended up with: "How thankful I am that, as a public man, you have given up the dreadful vice of intoxication!"
