Western Trend Of Capital And Population Is Ending

So Declares MacLure Sclanders, Secretary Of Maritime Board Of Trade On A Visit To Great Britain.

Quebec had "picked all the plums," but now was the opportunity for the Maritime Provinces.

"The western provinces say they want no more immigration for the present," Mr. Sclanders said. "Perhaps with westward flow of capital and population stanchoned, the rich natural resources of the far eastern provinces will be developed adequately at last."

Interviewed by a representative of the Morning Post, Mr. Sclanders said that although the western provinces did not require immigrants as much as before, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, needed them more than ever. It was essential, Mr. Sclanders added, that newcomers to the Maritimes should be experienced farmers, and if possible possess a little capital. New Brunswick, he said, would naturally prefer settlers from the British Isles, but he had learned there were very few farmers to spare in the mother country.

Continuing, Mr. Sclanders declared that Scandinavians would prove very suitable as they were easily assimilated and were conscientious, able workers.
