EGGS AS LARGE AS BARRELS. Explorers and travellers occasionally find eggs of enormous size. Several specimens, for instance, are in existence of the eggs of the epinornis, a gigantic extinct feathered monster which formerly inhabited Madagascar. The epinornis laid an egg as big as a large small bear barrel, its contents being equal to those of about two hundred hens' eggs. How these relics of past times first came to be discovered makes interesting reading. A French trader in the interior of Madagascar was struck by the unusual appearance of certain vessels used by the natives for storing water. Closer investigation showed that these odd-looking utensils were in reality gigantic eggs cut in halves. The natives, on being questioned, said that they knew nothing of the bird, but that the eggs were found buried in a certain sand-pit some distance off. An offer to purchase all that could be procured resulted in the discovery of six perfect specimens. These were removed to France and are now in the museum of the Academy of Sciences at Paris.

Darken Gray Hair, Look Young, Pretty. Sage Tea and Sulphur Darkens So Naturally That Nobody Can Tell. Hair that loses its color and lustre, or when it fades, turns gray, dull and lifeless is caused by a lack of sulphur in the hair. Our grandmothers made up a mixture of Sage Tea and Sulphur to keep her locks dark and beautiful and thousands of women and men who value that even color; that beautiful dark shade of hair which is so attractive, use only this old-time recipe. Nowadays we get this famous mixture improved by the addition of other ingredients by asking at any drug store for a bottle of "Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound," which darkens the hair so naturally, so evenly, that nobody can possibly tell it has been applied. You just dampen a sponge or soft brush with it and draw this through your hair, taking one small strand at a time. By morning the gray hair disappears; but what delights the ladies with Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound is that, besides beautifully darkening the hair after a few applications, it also brings back the gloss and lustre and gives it an appearance of abundance.

The Evening Story

CLEAR AS DAYLIGHT

Camilla Turner was a most dignified, attractive little figure in her dark skirt and gray silk blouse. She had around her a lavender and white "hug-me-tight" which was doing its best to protect and comfort. Her gray hair, that was almost rose-like. After a life of all sorts of cares and troubles and sorrows she was still charming and serene even now, when she felt that she was facing the hardest condition that she had ever known.

The only one in the world, it seemed to her, whom she could tell was Ella Hart. Ella Hart had been faithful servant and affectionate companion to Camilla for fourteen years. Presently she ceased rattling the furnace and came upstairs. Ella was forty, a slim-waisted woman with a plain, gentle face and a peculiarly sympathetic voice. "I want to tell you something, Ella. No! I want to ask you something," Camilla swallowed. "Have you noticed anything queer about Mr. Turner lately?"

"We—" Ella hesitated. "Yes, I have, she said frankly. 'He's acted out of sorts. No, that ain't it exactly. He's acted like he was thinking of something else. It's made him touchy. I think that's all I've noticed.'"

"He isn't himself," sighed Camilla. "It was going to be a relief to talk to Ella."

After a moment she went on: "You know all we've been through for fourteen years. Ella, Mr. Turner's business began to fail right then and after it finally went to pieces we got poorer and poorer until now—her chin quivered. "I simply don't know what we're going to do." She went on, "There's a mortgage on the place here and that means a lot of interest to pay. Lewis is certainly not doing any business and yet he fairly lives at that little office of his downtown. I don't believe he sleeps at all and he doesn't eat enough to keep a fly alive. He's worrying about something and I'm afraid it is the mortgage. If Davidson should reclose we'd be in the street, Ella."

"When you're up in the world you have more friends than you need, but when you're down where are they? I feel sometimes Ella, as though you were the only person I could trust or confide in. That's why I'm telling you this now."

Ella crossed the hall and the adjacent dining room and Lewis Turner appeared at the door. He was a fine looking man of seventy, though rather careworn. He wore a seakink cap and a beautiful overcoat, carefully preserved since the days of his affluence. Until fourteen years before he had been one of the busiest, richest, most successful men in the whole country; then reverses came overwhelmingly. He had lost again and again until he was at the bottom of his pile. It had been dishonour he would have saved something for his wife but even the little property that was left had gone into the general ruin. In their old age they faced destitution. Yet because they lived on in their old home, surrounded by handsome, old-fashioned furniture, with a maid in charge, and wore fine clothing of better days people sneered at them for a pair of poor pretenders. Nobody would believe that their situation was what it was. Only Ella Hart knew how she shook the flour sack and scolded and pinched and contrived to keep food on the table.

"Well," Lewis Turner said, looking in at the two women. "It seems all fixed cold here. Why don't you heat it up a little?" "Ella has just been down cellar, Camilla said, while Ella directly vanished. Lewis knew perfectly well that there wasn't any coal, but it was his little subterfuge to lay the fault of the cold house on his women folk.

"Suppose that girl's going to have any supper today?" he demanded. "She's getting it on the table now. Sit down Lewis. You look tired."

"I'm damned tired. I've been running all over this town all day. I wondered why you did not come home to dinner," Camilla said. "Didn't have time. I ran into the restaurant and snatched a cup of coffee and a sandwich."

"Any news today?" Camilla inquired, trying in her anxiety to make conversation to get his mind off whatever it was working upon. "I don't know. Haven't had time to look at the paper. By George I wish that girl would hurry up. He galloped at her, watch. 'I've got to go right back down as soon as I eat.'"

Camilla rose and went into the kitchen. In a few minutes supper was on the table. Lewis, however, ate almost nothing. Never had he appeared so nervous, so unstrung. In vain Ella hovered about him with her daintiest offerings. At last he sprang up and hurried away.

"Don't sit up for me," he said. "I shall probably be busy till late. As the door closed on him Camilla and Ella looked at each other. There was apprehension, disturbance, interposition in their long meeting eyes. But neither spoke. Then Ella hurried out to the kitchen and left her mistress to weep alone.

After a time, Camilla calmed herself. She turned up the light and drew her work basket toward her. Beyond the great window the storm pressed heavily. Camilla never lowered her curtains. "There's any cheer in a lighted window I want people to have it," she always said. "And there is so little that I can do to be charitable now a days." She worked because she dare not be idle. All the same her thoughts flew about that dear, proud, humbled old figure in the lonely office waiting for business that never came. She shuddered when she thought of that last act of his father's. God help Lewis! All her prayers had concentrated into these three words—"God help Lewis!"

There was a rather loud muffled sound and both women sprang up. For Ella had just come in to sit with Camilla. "What was that?" Camilla breathed. "Sounds as if somebody's fallen on the front steps," Ella said. She whistled out of the room. Camilla stood pallid, trembling waiting. Then her heart began to beat again—she heard—Ella's voice and right after it her husband's.

"By gosh, that snow was so thick I couldn't see where I was going and I guess I scraped my knee," Lewis said. Camilla got to the door. There he stood white powdered, and Ella was trying to brush him. "You're a regular Santa Claus," she said.

"I guess I am." At last the coat and cap were in their places and he came rubbing his hands. By George, we're going to have a warmer here tomorrow," he said. "I've ordered those fellows to send up five tons of their best coal."

"Where are you going?" Camilla asked with concern. "I've got to go to the city on that early train tomorrow morning. I've come home to tell you so you can get ready."

"Ready!" Camilla gasped. "Yes, to go with me, I thought you would like a few days of outing. Must get all-fired dull for you sitting here day after day. I suppose Ella can get you ready."
