Native of This Province After a Career of Hardship and Adventure meets Generous Reward at Last--Is Now Home After Absence of Twenty-Five Years

They arrived in Charlottetown the other day a native of Cardigan in the person of Alex. D. McEvoy, who left home many years ago and after a career of more than ordinary adventure has emerged from the incidents and trials thereof, a wealthy man, the owner of mines that have made of him a millionaire.

He is now visiting his old home having gone east a few days ago as The Guardian has already announced.

Mr. McEvoy very kindly chatted with a representative of The Guardian and related the following facts which make his life an interesting topic:

He is a representative that the Province might well be proud of, a finely built athletic man. Twenty-five years ago I left home and started for the golden west as the gold fields of Colorado were then called. He has done a wonderful lot of travelling since that time.

From California I went to the Hawaiian Islands and from there finally drifted to the ice bound Alaskan country where at last Dame Fortune was to reward him for his arduous efforts.

I sailed for Skagway, Alaska, said Mr. McEvoy, on the ill-fated steamer Kutich on the 10th June, 1903, and crossed to Lake Bennett, and from there went down the Yukon River on a scow; went through the White Horse Rapids all right, but struck a rock in the Thirty Mile River and lost everything. But we got into Dawson City and went down the Yukon in a boat with Alex and John Patterson of Scotland.

I packed seventy-five pounds on my back to the head of the Tanana River. While there our supplies gave out and we nearly starved on the way back, but got into Circle City.

I went down the Yukon on a steamer to S. Michael's and on to Nome, but lay off Sledge Island for six days in a terrific hurricane which destroyed the best part of Nome City.

The next spring I went into Taldiz, Alaska, with several others, having a large pack train; got as far as Copper Centre when the others got cold feet and returned, and took a mule and went on with another man but he was drowned on the Copper River.

I with a missionary went down the same river in a boat, and we nearly lost our lives, but got over all the rapids, falls and rapids, and took boat from Lake Back for Skagway. I going to Dawson by boat and rail, and while there. There I started with a man by the name of McNamara, on the 10th June for the head of the White River but never got there on account of having contracted typhoid fever when but two days out on the trail. With a pack train of horses two of us kept on until we reached the head of Ninety-Mile River when the ravages of the fever compelled me to give up. While in my delirium I wandered away at night and was lost from camp for six days, but on the sixth day was found in a miraculous manner by my packer who had been looking for me all the time.

On the evening of the fifth day I had lain down to die of starvation, hardship and fever, having given up all hope of ever seeing the outside world again. But a kind Providence, in whom I always trust saved me for some good reason.

On the morning of the sixth day, after subsisting on grass, roots, and poison berries, I awoke at six a.m. and it seemed to me that a familiar voice was calling me from the top of the mountain, and directing me to set fire to a large spruce tree.

This I managed to do, and at that very moment my packer appeared for the last time on the summit of a high mountain from whence he had been looking down in the direction where I was located. He saw the blaze and smoke for a few seconds only and at once came down--it meant a distance of three miles--and rescued me. He managed to get me to the camp, where I nearly died from the reaction and the hardships I had endured.

On the way back to Dawson I was reduced almost to a skeleton my weight having decreased from 206 when I left that City, to 143. I went down the Yukon around to Nome and got into Los Angeles. From there I went to New Mexico, where Yet James B. Duke is to-day one of the wealthiest men in the world. When you see a liberal advertiser you see a rich man. The business man who in this age of advertising is afraid to invest his money in publicity will never accumulate a fortune.
