CULLAM'S PLAN

While the hours after midnight struck relentlessly from a nearby clock tower and the cooling night breeze released the sleeping city from the torrid grip of a prematurely early summer, Craig Cullam, wide-awake and alertly eager, outlined his scheme for saving Charles's marriage from shipwreck.

"Now, let's analyze Mrs. Page's side of it first," he said. "You say she's a romantic disposition, an idealist, a dreamer. She's a bit fed up with you because you've ceased to be a picturesque lover and become submerged in business and golf and acquaintances whom she finds ungenial. She unconsciously looks about for a new object to pin romance to. Along comes this saccharine play—don't tell my manager I said that!—She sees a dashing lover in a uniform that would make any man not hunch-backed or bow-legged, look good to any woman, and, when she meets this person, she thinks he's a fairly decent sort of fellow. Thereupon, she builds up a beautiful ideal which invests the fairly decent young man with all the admirable qualities of the widge lover, even though he hasn't in any way exhibited those qualities in real life. Her next step is to fall in love with the product of her own creation. It's Pygmalion and a spiritual Galatea, reversed. It's being done every day. All Mrs. Page needs is a good dose of disillusionment!"

Charles looked at the young actor questioningly, hope and despair struggling in his face.

"But how?" he asked. "You don't know Marjane?"

Cullam smiled confidently.

"I know human nature. Remember, swine back, I asked you if you knew the story of 'David Garrick'?" Well, this is it, briefly: David Garrick was a popular actor, a star of the first magnitude. He was an awfully nice fellow, too, and when a good friend of his came to him and told him that his young daughter had fallen in love with him, he agreed to cure her of her infatuation. So he arranged that she should be brought to his dressing-room and concealed behind a screen, could see and hear all that transpired there. Garrick then proceeded to give one of the finest performances of his career. He feigned drunkenness, was brutal to his dresser, spoke maudlinly of women, read foolish notes with loud guffaws, and finally, discovering her behind the screen, dragged her out roughly and endeavored to kiss her. Terrified, she fled from the place. She was ashamed, disgusted with herself, completely disillusioned, and cured of her infatuation. The pathetic twist to the story was, of course, that Garrick discovered when he dragged the girl out, that she was the unknown divinity whom he had worshipped from afar for many months, but he was bound by his promise to his friend not to confess the hoax, even for the sake of his own love. So he let her go out of his life, hating him. That doesn't mean, of course, doesn't concern us. My scheme is based on the disillusionment part."

Charles gazed at him with awe and admiration.

"and, you're clever, Craig! You're going to use this David Garrick idea to disillusion Marjane!"

"Exactly," agreed Cullam. "I may be comforted and hopeful beyond any expectancy he had entertained earlier in the evening of ever being happy again, had taken himself off home, most of the details for Marjane's disillusionment had been arranged.

"I have it!" Charles slapped his knee with an enthusiastic hand re-soundingly. "Three Oaks is the very place."

Cullam's brows raised questioningly. "Three Oaks is our country place about twenty miles out of town," Charles explained. "Marjane and I were planning to hang you down for a week-end as a sort of farewell party before you closed your play here. What could be a better place to pull off this plan of yours?"

He hesitated a moment, and looked troubled.

"Of course Marjane had expected to ask some other people down and make part of a house party of it," he went on slowly. "Would you have any objections to doing your sort of farewell audience? It wouldn't be very convincing for you to cut loose suddenly, with just Marjane and me, when you've always been the very model of decorum in our company—but under the stimulus of a party and lots to drink—you know."

Cullam nodded understandingly. "Have other guests, by all means. It never hurts an actor to be criticized for wild conduct. The general public is convinced we're all rones anyway."

The wise housekeeper, who wishes to join in the festivities of Carnival Week, will relieve herself of unnecessary baking by laying in a supply of WHITE LILY BISCUITS AND CAKES

The guests will appreciate the good quality.

"My client," declared the first lawyer, "is willing to do the right thing."

"So is mine," said the second lawyer.

"In that case, matters ought to be easy."

"I don't know. The next question is, what is the right thing?"

"Well?"

"And I fear it will take a long lawsuit to settle that."
