Here it is, the most amazing of all serials.

When Francis Ford and Grace Cunard brought out "Lucille Love" the serial as an institution was an experiment. It had been tried, but never in the widespread manner in which the Universal is in the habit of doing things. The success of that serial things. The determining factor in launching a number of others. The principle was established. It was a success. With their accustomed vigor and enthusiasm they set to work and the result was "The Broken Coin," its story was suggested by Miss Cunard, who has written more stories for the screen than any other person who has been called upon at the same time to play in them. Almost all the stories she and Mr. Ford have used in the years they have been with the Universal have come from her fertile pen. In "The Broken Coin" she has conjured up a character, which fits her like a glove, one who brings into being every atom of the sparkling personality which has charmed so many millions of moving picture fans who regard her as their favorite moving picture star. The role is that of a young intrepid newspaper woman, who brings every atom of the sparkling personality which has charmed so many millions of moving picture fans who regard her as their favorite moving picture star. The rest of the programme was in keeping with the high standard of excellence set by the Prince Edward, and included a four-part Vitagraph Broadway star feature, "The Man Behind the Door," featuring that clever English comic opera star, Cissy Fitzgerald, and Wally Van, another episode of the "Hazards of Helen" series and a laughable comedy.

If you could not manage to see The Broken Coin last night, don't miss it today.

A SYSTEM OF MEMORY TRAINING

Jamie's mother said that he never remembered anything. The simplest directions must be repeated two or three times over for him. But an observant person might have said that the reason Jamie did not remember was that he did not need to. His mother always said things over for him.

When Jamie's mother was ill, his grandmother came to take care of the family. Grandmother knew a great deal about boys, because she had brought up five, an d every one of them was a man to be proud of, and Jamie's father was one of them; and Jamie and his mother were sure he was a man to be proud of, even if grandmother had not thought so.

The first day grandmother was there Jamie forgot to go to the grocery and forgot to bring the jly from the preserve closet and forgot—but there were just seven other things that he forgot.

"You have to tell him a dozen times before he remembers," said poor mother from her pillow.
"O yes, ear! Let us teach him to remember with only one telling," said grandmother.
The next morning grandmother said: "It's time to feed the chickens again."
Just then Raymond called from the back yard. He had a new baseball mitt, and Jamie went out to admire it and try it on.
"Jamie," said grandmother from the doorway, "come here, please. Did you do what I told you?"
"What did you tell me, grandmother?" said Jamie pleasantly.
"Sit down here until you can remember," said grandmother.
Jamie scowled fiercely, but he sat down. He wanted very much to play ball with Raymond, so he hurried and thought of everything that he might be asked to do. When his eye fell upon the pan of chicken feed, he remembered and was off like a flash to do his work.
When he started to the grocery that day he came back to say that he had forgotten what he was to get.
"Sit down here and think until you remember it," said grandmother. And it took a much longer time.
Every time that day that he forgot what he had been asked to do he was required to sit down and try to recall it. Once he could not. He simply had not listened at all, and grandmother had to tell him again. But that was not until he had spent nearly a half hour trying to remember. No fellow likes to take a half hour to remember when the boys are out in the back yard waiting for him to help build a merry-go-round.
Before a week had passed Jamie's memory was improved to such a degree that he could listen to grandmother's grocery list once and then repeat it correctly to the clerk when he got to the store.—The Mother's Magazine.

Paint Your House With Sherwin Williams Paint

You paint your house to improve its appearance and to protect the material of which it is built from the wear and tear of the weather. Therefore the best paint you can buy is the most economical as it will last longer and look better than cheap paint.

Put paint on your buildings as assurance against the ravages of the weather (S. W. P. which means Sherwin Williams Paint—Prepared) on the cans of paint you buy, is paint insurance. It means that you get the best and purest paint.

It is reckless extravagance to buy cheap paint. For instance a paint at $2.50 per gallon that lasts 5 years or more is much cheaper than a paint at $1.50 a gallon that only lasts 2 years. In the first place you get paint protection at 50c a year, and in the second case your paint protection costs you 75c a year and at the end of 2 years you have to assume the whole expense of repairing. Ask us for Color Cards.

English Sheet Glass. We have a large stock of every size in 16 oz. and 21 oz. glass. English glass is the cleanest and best made. Buy the best. Our prices are lowest.
