ENGLAND SLIPPING INTO SEA.

Twenty Feet Each Year Is the Encroachment of the Water.

The alarming extent to which the sea is diminishing the area of the British Isles is hardly realized.

It is no longer safe to build near the coast line in many places, so persistent is the encroachment of the waters.

Freshwater Bay, in the Isle of Wight, is a case in point. Here there is great danger that Freshwater and Totland will be entirely cut off from the rest of the Isle of Wight, and a circumstance making the matter exceptionally serious is that on the portion which would be isolated are all the fortifications of the western part of the isle, including the Needless Fort, with its powerful ordnance.

The extent of the ravages of the sea may be judged by the fact that the continuous cliff road which formerly went round this portion of the Isle has been cut and now leads straight over the cliff into the sea.

A prominent resident of Freshwater expressed the opinion that prompt protective measures should be adopted by the War Office, the local authorities and private owners of land acting together.

In the current issue of The Lifeboat Society's journal an astounding statement is made. It is said that parts of the Holderness coast, in Yorkshire, between Bridlington and Spurn, are being swallowed up by the sea in exceptional years by as much as twenty feet a year.

At Pakefield, Suffolk, in 1884 the institution had two lifeboat houses on the seafront with timber slipways for launching the boats. Not only has every vestige of the houses and slipways disappeared, but many of the buildings standing some distance further inland have been washed away.

There are other parts of the coast, according to this journal, where to erect any thing of a character intended to be permanent would be simply throwing money into the sea.

The difficulty of dealing with the encroachments is that the sea is inexorable, and if its advance is stopped in one place it will force its way in another.
