A GRADUAL CHANGE.

Chapter 88.

"Pan will always be liked," George said once, because she's so adaptable. Sae's always ready to believe the other person is as wonderful as he thinks himself.

"You're quite wrong," Gloria contradicted. "She doesn't say much, but she sees pretty clearly into the other fellow's faults, only she forgives him for them in advance."

So Pan, who had never trusted her judgment before, now felt a little sure of herself in estimating people when she met them. She liked the five other guests that Mrs. Clarke had invited.

Pan, the neglected and snubbed, was a guest of honor. Moreover, these five nice young people considered it quite a special privilege to meet her—she found that out as soon as the first girl, a great, awkward blond creature with a skin like cream and roses, told her—

"Aunt Belle has done nothing but talk about you since she's met you, thinks you're the loveliest thing she's met. We've been jolly anxious to see you, too."

Pan blushed a little at the broad compliment, murmured something about "disappointment always follows great expectations," which she vaguely remembered hearing Gloria say once, and turned to meet the next guest.

Both girls were good looking, in spite of thick waists and badly dressed hair. Pan, who had acquired a sense of clothes from Gloria longed to put them into suitable frocks. She admired Mrs. Clarke and all Mrs. Clarke's type for that supreme disregard of fashion or even of becomingness in clothing. But these girls evidently were trying to "look smart" and didn't know how.

"You Americans always dress so beautifully," one girl said a little wittily, glancing from her much too voluminous satin to the airy fluff of tulle and silver braid that emphasized Pan's slenderness. "Look like Queen Titania in that dress, or some little elf full of dew drops."

"That's the sort of thing I should have said," a large voice boomed over her shoulder, and she turned to meet Mr. Clarke, a man of 50 odd with a gray "walrus" moustache and a long chin, ruddy cheeks and a lot of gray hair.

Mr. Clarke had been bred on the try square, he knew a lot about hunting, fishing and managing an estate. When an accident prevented him from riding, he took to books, and these days he spent most of his life between what his wife called his "study" and the front window of his club.

There were the three young men too, one was a captain in some regiment of "Guards" and was looked up to by the others; one was back from India and tanned dark from the sun; the third was running in some small district for M. P., and was teased about the coming election.

"They'll talk politics—for the benefit of the Member of Parliament and the colonies because of that grown one, and the army on account of the captain—dear me, what shall I do? I don't know a thing about any of those subjects!" Pan thought with distress.

And for a moment she felt as badly as when she was about to enter the "parlor" at the farm house in Norris City, where Gladys held court and the talk was personalities about people she scarcely knew or saw.

But these people, like Gloria's friends, included her tactfully in the talk, seeing her excusable ignorance of some subjects and explaining as they went along. So at no time was she out of it, and her self-consciousness and shyness vanished.

"Now I want to hear about America. We're going there some day, I hope," Mrs. Clarke's voice came after a long political discussion in which the present government (which always seems the least popular one) had been quite demolished and a whole new one set up. "Are the buildings really as high as we hear they are?"

"Higher," Pan answered smiling and readily talked about her home city of New York. Mrs. Clarke, always the perfect hostess, man aged it so she had several moments when she was the centre of the party. Mr. Clarke, who adored young people, devoted himself in turn to each of the young women.

Neil, it appeared, was the captain—though he didn't seem very busy at it. Pan thought, his talk was of everything but military matters. Ned took her home, and Ned was most charming.

"It's been splendid meeting you," he assured her at the hotel door. "Do you mind if I turn up at Aunt Belle's next time you're there?"

A new way of saying he wanted to see her! Pan was amused and flattered as she went up the stairs to the apartment.

It had been, from Gloria's point of view, a tame and perhaps uninspiring party. But to Pan it was the event of her life, her party, her new friends—she felt as though she had created them all herself.

"If George had been there—" she thought as she went to sleep.

Next day she wrote him a long and enthusiastic account of it.

"Frankie and I are to go to the Clarke's for the week-end in the country. Ned will be there too," wrote a few days later. "And I've progressed enough to dare give a luncheon at the hotel."
