Britains Second Old Vic.

London's Old Vic Theatre has for centuries been the leading Shakespearean playhouse in Britain. When it was bombed, the company carried on in other London theatres and now its name has been linked with the great west country city of Bristol.

"The Old Vic of the West" is the name Bristol has given to the repertory company of actors, designers and craftsmen recruited from the Old Vic Company in London. Headquarters is the lovely old Theatre Royal. Right now the company has just finished playing in the Festival of British Repertory Theatres in London. This Festival, which brought four leading provincial repertory companies to the capital, has been so successful that it is to be repeated next year.

Bristol begins its new season in September with two Shakespeare plays, a Restoration Play and a modern one. At Christmas children will come into their own when the Company stages Cinderella.

These young actors are playing in a theatre of great traditions. The Theatre Royal has seen Mrs. Siddons, the Kembles, Edmund and Charles Keen play on its boards. When it was offered for sale in 1922, the citizens of Bristol, proud of its history, bought it and placed it in trust for the nation.

Attached to the theatre is a club which supports the Company. Here lectures on drama are given by visiting dramatists. Fall day classes and evening classes held would-be actors and there are scholarships for the talented.

Prison Experiment

In Britain where new ideas on prison reform are rapidly being tried, they are trying out a "restore-them-to-normal-life" experiment.

Tucked away in the Romney Marshes is a new type of prison camp. It is without cells and without high walls cutting prisoners off from the outside world. Especially picked men of the prison services are operating this scheme for selected prisoners and are putting to the test the question: "If you give a prisoner a taste of freedom and train him in useful work before he leaves prison, will he revert to crime on his release?"

Britain's Home Secretary, Mr. Chuter Ede, is watching the experiment closely. He and the Prison Commissioners realize that one way of reducing the prison population is to prevent men from returning to crime.

The camp is used mainly as a bridge between the life of the outside world. In the records is the story of one man who had for years reverted to crime as soon as he was released from prison. After treatment at the experiment camp he was found a job in a skilled trade, became a charge hand after six months and is still doing well.

The camp has already dealt with 100 men, but the community will soon have a constant population of 100.

Said one prison officer, "Aldington goes beyond the limits of the prison without bars. Complete freedom is offered to the serving prisoners and he doesn't escape because he knows that at least he is being reformed for a new life."

Most of the men mix freely with the local people and go to the village church on Sundays. Trades are taught in the prison and every effort is made to reeducate prisoners.

Chelsea Rebuilds

Like every other district of London, Chelsea was badly bombed in the war. Now it is being rebuilt with a difference. Chelsea, determined to remain the home of British art, is being re-designed with emphasis on apartments suitable for young painters and sculptors.

Since the 15th century, when artists gathered at the home of Sir Thomas More, the area between King's Road and the River Thames has been the traditional centre of art in Britain. The Renaissance movement took root there, and then came Hans Holbein, Wren, Turner, Whistler, Sargent and the great artists of modern times.

But today Chelsea faces the threat of a drift-away of young artists because of a studio shortage. Alarmed by the situation the Chelsea Arts Club approached the Council and the result was this building program.
