ce, still, said the preacher, one must enter an objection against the dogmatism of science. Science might heal the bodies of men; but the soul of man was not the mere analysis of a test-tube. Dealing with the third fact which had a spiritual effect on theological thinking—that of the critical philosophy—Mr. Mulligan, made reference to Kant's objection to the religious virtue which was based on the hope of Heaven and the fear of Hell; his objection being that such was not virtue at all, but rather self-interest, and that man ought to do good and follow after righteousness without hope of reward or fear of punishment. There were other interesting developments in theological thought. There were certain reactionary movements. There were the men in the old churches, Protestant and Catholic who were faithful to the modern spirit of progress, undermining religious faith. These could be traced in movements in these churches during the century. In summing up, Mr. Mulligan pointed out that, in spite of all these changes in philosophy and viewpoints, man still felt the need of God. The Bible was still the world's bestseller. The Gospel of Christ was still the only hope of the world's salvation. And man still held to an eternal hope. These were the things that could not be shaken, they were what would remain.
