"Jealous Hearts"

By MILDRED BARBOUR

THE OLD FAMILIAR LURE

As Tony entered Elinor's little drawing-room, a slim, dark man of great distinction, wearing an imperial and a monocle, rose from a seat by the fire.

Tony knew that he was Danelli, even before Elinor introduced him casually as her teacher, and his lips tightened as he bowed stiffly.

Danelli, although his bow was suave and graceful, eyed Tony narrowly. Elinor had merely said carelessly, with a wave of her hand toward the newcomer: "Tony Deering—from my home in Maryland."

Danelli had sensed Tony immediately as a rival; it would have taken an less keen eyes than his to discern at a glance Tony's feelings toward Elinor. They were apparent, despite his effort to be very cool and casual and brotherly.

He said stiffly: "I beg your pardon for intruding," and added rudely, because he felt an insane desire to get his hands around the suave Danelli's throat: "I had hoped to see you alone on—a most important matter."

"You should have telephoned, old dear," drawled Elinor, highly enjoying the situation and feeling especially cocky over Tony's arrival—she had known all along that he wouldn't be able to keep away. "I'm so rarely alone."

Danelli rose and bowed to Elinor. "I am sure that you and your friend from your home will have much to discuss. I am de trop, is it not so? I will make my adieux."

"So long, Danelli!" Elinor dismissed him casually.

"We shall dine at eight," Danelli said distinctly, with a triumphant glance at Tony. "My car will call for you. I regret that I cannot come myself, but as host—" he shrugged and added almost pleadingly "May I hope that you will do me the honor to be on time?"

Elinor laughed good-naturedly. "Tony will tell you that I'm never that. The only occasion when I was on time in my life was my uncle's funeral. I never liked him."

When the door had closed upon Danelli, Elinor trailed her gleaming golden draperies back into the salon and, dropping down into the heap of cushions on the divan, patted the place beside her.

"Sit here, old thing, and spill the bad news. Anybody can see by your face that it wasn't the desire to see me that brought you."

Tony hesitated briefly and then accepted her invitation. The sunlight, filtering through curtains of primrose gauze, touched Elinor's hair and turned it to molten copper. She reclined lazily in cushions of green and gold. Above her head in their golden cage, two scarlet cardinals poured out liquid melody—silver notes that reminded Tony, against his determination to forget, of a moonlight night in August, with a mocking-bird singing in the pines.

The indefinable fragrance of Elinor was all about him.

Somehow he managed to resist the lure of her provocative smile, the challenge of her mocking eyes. He said abruptly:

"I came to find out for myself what sort of a jam you'd got yourself into."

Elinor raised questioning brows: "Jam? I'm not aware of any jam."

"That so? ... Then read this!" He took the anonymous letter from his coat pocket and handed it to her.

She read it through and chuckled. "A woman's handwriting. Some catty female, of course. Don't tell me you're fool enough to fall for that sort of stuff, Tony!"

"I am—where you're concerned," burst from him, without his volition. "It's jealous women who ruin other women's reputations. I—we can't have you talked about, Elinor, even if there's nothing back of it all."

She leaned toward him, her eyes provocative.

"And, if there were something back of it?" she questioned softly.

Tony's hands clenched.

"Then I'd go out and kill that scoundrel who just left!" Elinor's laughter rippled forth.

"Oh, Tony, what a fire-eating Southerner you are! Don't you know the day of chivalry is past? Girls take care of themselves these days and do a good job of it, too. They don't need the men of their family to help them."

Tony rose with dignity.

"Then I'm afraid Dad and I belong to another generation, and I'm rather glad we do. Of course, I've no control over you or your actions—you're only the foster-sister of my wife. But you and I have been friends from childhood, and I resent any insinuation against you just as I'd resent it against my own sister. You are like a sister."

Elinor's chuckle interrupted him and brought the tall-tale blood to his forehead.

"Am I, Tony?" she queried mockingly. "Do you think of me always as a sister?"

He turned toward her and looked down at her with tortured eyes. "Elinor, for Heaven's sake! I'm married to Millicent and I—I love her, and I'm going to be loyal to him.

Forty-three American cities, ranging in population from 36,000 to 3,000,000, have a redder homicide record than the two greatest cities in Soviet Russia, Moscow and Leningrad. This is the startling information contained in a recent report by an insurance company statistician, Dr. Herbert L. Hoffman.

In the 122 leading cities of the United States, one person in every 10,000 met a violent death during 1927.

The outstanding aspect of the murder situation in the United States," says Dr. Hoffman, "is the ease with which firearms are obtainable throughout the country. The first essential step toward control of the murder situation is to make an end of the fiction that every one has a right to bear arms in civilized society. The sale of firearms should be absolutely prohibited, except under rigid police control."

her always, in thought as well as deed. Can't you let me alone?" Elinor's drooping lids hid her triumphant eyes.

"If you have to ask assistance from me, it must be rather difficult to remain faithful, Tony."

For answer, he strode to the door, opened it, and picked up his hat from a tiny table in the hall.

"Good-by!" he said shortly.

"Why, where are you going?" She was taken aback.

"To see that man," was the reply he flung over his shoulder before the door closed upon him with a bang.

Breaking The Bank

(By British United Press)

Paris, May 10. A curious demonstration took place on the initiative of Edouard Rigal, who has made a long study of the game of roulette, with a view to proving that a careful player with a modest capital can be sure of winning.

A number of well-known, frequenters of the tables at Monte Carlo and Ostend assembled, in company with some possessors of so-called "systems" and mathematical experts on the theory of probabilities, to watch Rigal play against the bank. The ball was put in motion by a professional croupier, who was later relieved by two or three players.

Rigal started with a capital of 2,700 francs (about $110), and, in spite of what is said to have been an exceptional series of unlucky runs, left the table at the end of three hours with a profit of 395 francs (over $15.00). His highest stake was 480 francs (about $18.00). The ball was put into action 204 times, so that the profit works at 1 franc 10 centimes (6 cents) per stake.

This result is not so surprising as it seems. It is in fact well-known that a certain number of small players at Monte Carlo make a regular, if not handsome, livelihood out of the tables. But to do so requires an exhausting watchfulness and restraint.

Colonel Elvengren, an unfortunate Finnish officer, who served with great distinction in the war in the Russian Guards, and was virtually tortured to death last year by the Soviet Government in Petrograd, where he was seized on the charge of fomenting a counter-revolutionary plot, at one time adopted this means to keep body and soul together.

With a capital of no more than 1,000 francs ($40.00) he could apparently be certain of winning 30 francs in a day. He only played with small stakes, and made it an absolute rule to leave the table when he had won 30 francs. But he found playing like this entailed such a mental strain that after a few months he preferred to quit the Casino and seek work as a navy in the Monaco dockyards.
