THE GREEN SHADOW

by HERMAN LONDON

"THAT'S MISS CONWAY!"

For a moment longer she remained silent, almost breathless, than gave a clear, bright laugh. "I don't feel such dread of Doctor Moffett now. You have—er—pulled his fangs." "Splendid! We are making progress. Now that we have deprived the devil of his cloven hoof, there is another thing you must know. You have no idea, I suppose, as to the location of the house where Doctor Moffett interviewed you?" "Not the slightest. I was taken there in an automobile by a most fascinating woman who calls herself Miss Conway. The windows were blinded and I couldn't see where we were going."

"Miss Conway?" Dale murmured. "Well, names don't seem to mean much in this affair. The house Miss Castle, was No. 262 Bank street. A certain Mr. Alexander Ferryman owns it. He also owns the adjoining house, No. 260, in which he resides at present."

Adele gave him a startled glance. "How do you know all this?" she exclaimed. Dale smiled. "For the present you will have to accept my unsupported word. Until four years ago, when his wife left him, Mr. Ferryman lived in No. 262. Then the associations grew too painful and he moved next door. The only occupant of the former residence is an old caretaker named Axelson."

"The only ostensible occupant, that is, it appears Dr. Moffett is making clandestine use of the house for his enterprises. Just now I can't tell you how he contrives it, or why he has selected another man's house for the scene of his operations, but it was to that same house you were taken by Mrs. Conway."

Adele inclined her head thoughtfully. "It scarcely seems possible. We went there in broad daylight and we entered by the front door. There was no secrecy about it at all. We didn't act like trespassers. The Mr. Ferryman you speak of must have seen us if he had happened to look out the windows of the next house, and the caretaker surely—"

"I must have a little talk with the caretaker," Dale interrupted. "I have my doubts about him. As for Ferryman, he may have been absent. Or perhaps, a clock of invisibility over the car and its occupants. At any rate, that was the house. And last night a most distressing affair took place there—murder."

A little exclamation of horror broke from the girl's lips. "It appears Mr. Ferryman's missing wife returned very quietly," Dale went on, speaking rapidly, as if trying to skip over the unpleasant details. "Some time during the night she was killed. This morning the caretaker found the body in one of the upstairs rooms."

"It's quite pathetic. All this time Ferryman was held to his faith that she would return. He has kept everything in order for her home-coming at the former residence. Now he is heartbroken. The blow may kill him. The wife was much younger than he and from what I've heard she must have been a beauty."

"Have you seen her?" "No, but some one gave me a description of her this morning. It gave me quite a vivid picture of her." He proceeded to repeat the detailed description of the dead woman which Captain Summers had given him. Adele listened intently, her face growing tenser and tenser, and toward the end she uttered a startled little cry. "That's Miss Conway!" she exclaimed.

It was Dale's turn to show astonishment. "Miss Conway? Are you sure?" "The description fits her exactly. Of course, it's possible for two persons to look almost exactly alike."

"Yes, possible, but in this case the coincidence is a bit staggering. H'm! No, I can't believe it's a coincidence. The woman who took you to No. 262 Bank street must have been Ferryman's missing wife. If so, she must have been associated with Dr. Moffett. That would partly explain why Dr. Moffett found it so easy to make use of Ferryman's house."

"It explains nothing else, however. Ferryman, poor devil—but all that is beside the issue. What interests us more is that your father is being persecuted by one of the blackest soundrels in creation."

THE PICAROON'S PAST

Her face darkened. The strange man seated beside her had momentarily scattered the clouds hanging over her, but now the shadow fell athwart her path again. "Will you let me help you?" he asked.

"Why would you wish to help me?" "I hardly know." A look of wistfulness entered his gray eyes. "Life is a queer thing. Fate is having its merry way with us. Now and then we feel like taking a hand in the game. Do you know, when I caught a glimpse of you at 262 Bank street I was reminded of some one—some one almost as good and beautiful as you."

She felt a rush of color to her cheeks and her eyes fell. "That isn't flattery. It's only a statement of fact. I am trying to make you understand something I scarcely understand myself. She—the other one—went away and left me one day, just as poor Ferryman's wife left him. She wasn't to blame. There had been a—misunderstanding. The majesty of the law was at fault."

He chuckled a little bitterly. "The law makes queer mistakes at times, and prison walls are ugly things. Such perishable flowers as love and faith can't survive for long in their shadow. But I mustn't bore you with all this. It happened years ago, and now—"

His voice dropped, then paused. With his cane he was tracing figures in the sandy walk at their feet. A feeling of sympathy and understanding took hold of her as she listened her mind bridging the gaps in his story.

He laughed. "They say time heals all wounds. It's a pretty piece of fiction. Some wounds form scars and last forever. Maybe I'm a hopeless imbecile. I should let bygones be bygones, but somehow I can't. I'm a vindictive cuss, you see, Miss Castle. The law did its best to tear my life to tatters, and ever since I've been snapping back like an impudent bull pup."

"The temptation to get even has been a little too strong for me. I have tweaked the law's nose and twisted its tail. Silly rot, isn't it? Well, that's the way I am. But once in a while, when I see a woman who is both beautiful and true, then—Oh, hang it all! I'm trying to explain, and I'm making a mess of it."

She smiled vaguely. "I think I understand. And I—I think you are just splendid!"

"Well, opinions differ. Today I was lunching with a man who wants to put me in jail. He may succeed some day, but first I want to accomplish a number of things. You can help me by permitting me to help you!"

"Oh, gladly!" He fixed her with a lingering faintly smiling glance. "Great! If Doctor Moffett could see you now he would shake in his boots. We'll put a crimp in his dirty game. But where to begin? I had an idea this morning."

"Now—if the woman who was murdered last night is the same person you knew as Miss Conway, that complicates the situation. I must mul over it a while. I may make a call or two this evening. You may hear from me tomorrow morning. In the meantime, remember the caterpillar."

"I shan't forget," she promised. She smiled brightly again. Impulsively she reached out her hand, and their alliance was sealed with a clasp. Dale remained seated on the bench as she walked away, watching the sager, graceful motions of her fresh young limbs. A little sigh escaped him. "Steady, old boy!" he told himself. "The Picaroon mustn't look too deeply into eyes like those."
