CURSE O' LOVE
A Story of Love and its Test
By MILDRED BARBOUR
CHAPTER 2.

CONCERNING THE ACTION AND CHARACTERS:

CYNTHIA GREER, the beautiful, spoiled, ultra-modern only daughter of a wealthy family, receives, on the eve of her marriage to MAJOR BASIL HARCOURT, retired of the British army, a man nearly twice her age, the anonymous gift of a magnificent black opal.

THE BLACK OPAL.

"I've a wonderful gift to show you, directly dinner's over," Cynthia whispered to her fiancé at her first opportunity after the company was seated at the table. "It arrived just this evening, and, by some queer chance, whoever sent it forgot to put it in a card. But you'll know, I'm sure, it must be from one of your friends in the East."

Major Harcourt smiled at her, full appreciation of her loveliness showing in his kind brown eyes. "What makes you think it comes from the East?"

"Oh, it couldn't come from anywhere else on earth, I can feel it." He laughed softly.

"You're jolly sensitive for such a gay, laughing little thing!" His hand brushed hers under cover of the table cloth. He was very much in love. She hadn't a doubt about that. She hadn't lifted a finger to attract him; she hadn't seemed to care whether he asked her to marry him or not. Her money meant little to him, who had plenty of his own.

Harcourt was one of those men who possess a latent fascination discoverable only to the unfeeling success with women. He was tall, slender, erect, with the bronze of India's sun on his lean face; with dark hair only slightly thinning at the temples, and a close-clipped, dark moustache; with eyes—dark, sparkling, and an unapproachable world-weariness in an unassuming young girl, and with a row of distinguished service medals on the breast of a handsome uniform. He came of distinguished family and was a member of London's most exclusive social circles.

Still, wonder that Cynthia, with an ambitious mother behind her, had not had the heart to refuse him—or that she was going to marry him the next day!

There was dancing after dinner, but Cynthia drew her fiancé aside in the midst of the first tango. "Come—I want to show you my gift. Go up to the library, where the other presents are, and wait for me. I haven't put it there yet, because I wanted you to see it first."

When she came down from her dressing-room, with the green jewel-case in her hand, he was gazing at the lavish display of gifts with a quizzical expression.

"I say, we've a lot of friends, haven't we?" he remarked. Then, suddenly, he drew her to him, and lifted her face to his. "Cynthia, I love you with all my heart and soul," he whispered, and kissed her with a curious reverence. "Are you happy?" she asked, with the breathless need for speech of one who accepts love without giving it. "Happier than I have ever been before in my life."

She was still in his arms, but she said: "Yet you must have loved many other women before me." He put his lips to her hair. "At my age it would be useless to deny it. I couldn't lie to you. But under the subdued lights, its hidden fires blazed forth beneath the smoky surface which seemed, as before, to be the twisting spirals of Cynthia, like the malevolent beauty which held her spell-bound, again. For a few minutes she forgot that Major Harcourt had not spoken.

"Isn't it exquisite?" she breathed, and raised her eyes confidently to his. He had gone ashy gray. His eyes stared, fascinated, at the jewel on his bed of white velvet. He seemed turned to stone, except where a pulse hammered at his temple. "Basil—what is it?" she cried, catching his arm.

He came to himself with a start, passed a quick hand over his eyes, and drew an unsteady breath. "Nothing, nothing!" he declared, hastily, in a hollow, forced voice. "A touch of vertigo, that is all. Looking at bright objects sometimes does it to me."

Cynthia was sympathetic. "Sit down here!" she ordered, dragging at a chair. "And I'll ask Dad for brandy. I won't be a minute."

But he caught her arm, detaining her. "The names of the ponds which lie along this shore—Adam Branders, Cousins and Campbell, commemorate early settlers in the district. SEA VIEW—DARNLEY

(By H. A. Messervy.)

Sea View, is in truth, well named. The road is never far from the sea coast; whether your car is on the summit of a ridge or in the bottom of a hollow you never lose sight of the waters of the Gulf. Here, too, the land slopes sharply from the road the undulating fields, their squares of green chequered with the gold of the ripening harvest, fall away to the tops of the cliffs. For a few miles the land between the road and the sea is bare of trees. The farm houses nestle in the valleys, seeking shelter there from the North East gales of the winter, which here, indeed, is felt in all their fury. In the mellow rays of the afternoon sun the background of the scene smiles up to you in a friendly way. But there is something about it—something sinister—which makes one feel that, when the skies are hidden with the gray wrath of a flying cloud and the gloom of the gathering storm, it is enfolded all the country in its slow pall of darkness, this land would be in full sympathy and collusion with the wild fury of the storm. Would not those stark cliffs among whose rocks the eddies now murmur in hollow whispers, welcome to her destruction the hunted craft fleeing before the vengeance of the gale? Will might the children in that homestead by the sea cuddle closer about the roaring fire, in the cheer of the lamp-light as they feel the fabric of their home quiver beneath the onslaught of the storm. And well might they fancy, hearing the mournful howling in the chimney, and the rattling of the window-panes, that the spirits of the drowned, whose limp bodies the waves evanescently now were making sport of along the shore, were essaying a last despairing effort for a few moments of human sympathy and compassion, before the tempest bore them away for ever, like the fallen leaves of autumn, from the life of men.

Nor would these be idle fancies. As we have noted before, many ships found their last resting place along these iron shores in the great "Year of the Gale." It is likely that a disaster on such a scale will ever be repeated here. For no foreign fishermen come here now, and the local fishing boats are equipped, one and all, with motors, which allow them, no matter how calm the weather, to return to their home port each evening.

The names of the ponds which lie along this shore—Adam Branders, Cousins and Campbell, commemorate early settlers in the district. "Nonsense." He managed to laugh. "I'm all right again. I give you my word. I—I haven't been feeling fit for several days. Caught the black-water fever in—the East, years ago, you know, and it comes back a good, really."

"But do sit here and dance," she begged. "Don't try to rest any more tonight, if you're not up to it." (To be continued.)
