FAVORITE HYMNS AND THEIR WRITERS By Rev. Archer Wallace

"Dear Lord and Father of Man-kind." He was only fourteen when he read these poems of Burns, but what they meant to him may be gathered from the lines he wrote many years later: "How oft that day, with fond delusion, I sought the maple's shadow, And sang with Burns the hours away, Forgetful of the meadow."

Encouraged by his sister, Whittier sent his first verses as a newspaper editor by William Lloyd Garrison, who was so struck by their quality that he rode fifteen miles to make the acquaintance of his young contributor—an acquaintance which ripened into a firm friendship and led to Whittier becoming a journalist. Whittier became an ardent abolitionist. He threw himself with unflinching passion, on the side of those opposed to slavery. His poetic gifts and indeed the whole strength of his young manhood, he gave without reserve to the abolition cause. It was during these days that he wrote some of his finest poems. It is unlikely that Whittier intended his poems to be used as hymns, but their unquestioned spiritual tone made them appropriate for public worship and at least seventy-five of his hymns are now in general use. Probably the most people would give first place to "Dear Lord and Father of Man-kind." Very few hymns strike as perfectly the note of true worship. Other favorites of Whittier are: "When On My Day of Life the Psalm is Not Allowed," "O Sometimes I feel as if I were a stranger here," "Lord and Master of Us All," "Whittier died in 1857 and a watcher recorded the lines beginning: "When on my day of life the night is falling."

Mrs. (Senator) Robertson entertained in honor of Mr. Poinsette on Tuesday evening at her pretty home on Prince Street. Mr. Poinsette being an intimate friend of her nephew Mr. Gordon Brownell of Wall Street, New York, who is one of the directors of the Doherty firm.
