CHAPTER XIV—Continued. "She is very beautiful. It is you I love, Hope." A flood of color came into her cheeks then, as she stood a moment looking down at the flower in silence. "I shall keep your secret," she said tenderly and hesitatingly as she spoke, "and when you are through college—and you are older—and I am older—and you love me as you do now—I hope—I shall love you, too—as I do now."

Her lips were trembling as she gave me that sweet assurance, dearer to me far dearer than all else I remember of that golden time, and tears were coursing down her cheeks. For myself I was in a worse plight of emotion. I dare say she remembered also the look of my face at that moment. "Do not speak of it again," she said as we walked away together on the worn sod of the orchard meadow, now sown with apple blossoms, "until we are older, and if you never speak again I shall know you—you do not love me any longer." The dinner horn sounded. We turned and walked slowly back. "Do I look all right?" she asked, turning her face to me and smiling sweetly. "All right," I said. "Nobody would know that any one loved you—except for your beauty and that one track on your cheek." She wiped it away as she laughed. "Mother knows anyway," she said, "and she has given me good advice."

"It is you I love, Hope." Wait!" she added, stopping and turning to me. "Your eyes are wet." I felt for my handkerchief. "Take mine," she said. Elder Whitmarsh was at the house, and they were all sitting down to dinner as we came in. "Hello!" said Uncle Eb. "Here's a good lookin' couple. We've got a chicken pie, an' a Bap's minister for dinner, an' both good. Take yer bow nex' t' the minister," he added as he held the chair for me. Then we all bowed our heads, and I felt a hearty amen for the elder's words. "O Lord, may all our doing and saying and eating and drinking of this day be done, as in thy sight, for our eternal happiness and for thy glory. Amen."

CHAPTER XV. If all people I ever knew Ebenezer Brower had the surest eye for looking into one's soul, and I myself have some gift of penetration. I knew shortly that Mrs. Brower, wise and prudent woman that she was, had suspected my love for Hope and her love for me and had told her what she ought to say if I spoke of it. The maturity of judgment in Hope's answer must have been the result of much thought and counsel, it seemed to me.

SEE THAT SIGN?

IT swings from over our shop now! It means more comfort for you, better shoes, surer value, safer buying. It is the symbol of the "Slater Shoe," and a duplicate of the trade-mark on the lining of each pair where the Makers' price is also branded. "The Slater Shoe," is the only Canadian shoe made in a factory which makes no other grade, price, nor kind. It is the result of specialism, of making but one thing at its very best, and at its lowest possible cost, quality considered.

This means selecting leathers, months ahead, so as to be sure of uniformly good grade. It means hiring, and keeping, the best shoe workmen in the market, because, only a very good workman is quick enough on such critical work to get profitable results for us out of using our costly machinery. It means charging against the salary of each workman any pair of shoes he makes which is not up to Inspectors' standard, so as to maintain uniform quality.

Then, the Makers' own price being stamped, with his trade-mark, on the lining of each shoe puts responsibility for the hidden wear, and comfort, directly upon the shoulders of the manufacturer. When a genuine "Slater Shoe" goes wrong, you know that the Makers stand ready to make it good, up to the price they themselves valued it at. Isn't this shoe-insurance of a tangible kind? There isn't a shoe on this market with so much style combined with so much wear, comfort and fit, as the "Slater Shoe," which is stamped on the lining with the Makers' price, viz. $3.50 or $5.00. We want you to come in and see our new stock of "The Slater Shoe," and let us prove this statement.

GHASTLY DISCOVERY.

MONTREAL, July 11.—A shocking discovery was made today when the body of a man was found in a box car belonging to the Grand Trunk, in an advanced state of decomposition. The car was lying on a siding and the odor attracted attention. This caused a search to be made, when the remains were found in a very much decomposed condition. It is thought the man was stealing a ride and got locked in the car and was probably starved to death. Letters in his clothes indicate that the man may have been Thomas Keen, of Norton Mills, Vermont.
