Study What You Want in a Mate Dorothy Dix Analysis Is Good For Your Future

Every Person Should Give Careful Consideration to the Type of Man or Woman He Will be Happiest With After Marriage Before Selecting a Mate

Boys and girls are continually asking me what qualities they should look for in their prospective mates. To which I can only reply: 'What sort of a wife or husband do you want? Do you desire something for ornament or utility?'

They are all there—every variety of man and woman—on the stage in order, to be had for the taking. It really does not matter which one you pick out just so it is your own particular choice and the one that suits you.

So I would say to a boy who was thinking of marriage to vivisect himself first and make sure of what he wants in a wife before he pops the question to any girl.

But, if you want to sport around, don't bring trouble on yourself and the woman by marrying a little stay-at-home who can't be dragged away from the baby's crib...

And to a girl I would say: Consider the kind of a husband that will suit your own tastes and complexions as carefully as you would a hat...

In a word, a sister first what you want in a husband or wife and try to get that. That is the whole of the secret of how to be happy though married.

THE GREEN HUSSAR By HENRY VON RHAN

(Continued) Very good. Put through an immediate call to these operatives and inquire if a party of three officers in uniforms other than those generally worn by the officers of the capitalist army of Saxe-Radig detained at any of these points.

Molotov reached into a drawer and bringing out a train schedule, studied it carefully. Comrade Molotov, Klein said a few minutes later, I can definitely report that the officers did not get off at Godesburg, Dutzel or Schalbach.

The party we are interested in, said Molotov, pointing to the message, consists of a former Cossack named von der Lanz, a millionaire flunkie, the so-called Count Hohenlohe, and Baron Rautavlant, who is none other than Alexander II, the former King of Zagau.

For a moment Molotov, still ignoring the third man present, let his shrewd eyes wander over the table, tense form of Abraham Klein. Then, veiling a look of a satisfaction, he reached for the decoded message again.

Comrade Zuppke's orders are specific, he said crisply. The matter of the King's arrival is to remain an absolute secret to us and the remaining members of the Committee of Direct Action. We are expressly prohibited from taking any measures until Comrade Zuppke's arrival.

When is this to be? interrupted Klein impatiently. This afternoon, replied Molotov soothingly, on the two o'clock train.

Taking his eyes off Abraham Klein a moment, Molotov glanced at the desk clock. Train Number 74 will arrive in fifteen minutes, he snapped.

No, comrade, cried Klein quickly, I could not rush myself. When I think of what I could do with one hand grenade or automatic pistol—

Early morning sunlight streamed through the high French windows of the Imperial Arms Hotel in Gortitz. In the main living room of the Royal Suite three debonair gentlemen sprawled at their leisure in silk dressing gowns and slippers.

Our comfort, yawned the King from the deep recesses of an easy chair, is due largely to the indefatigable motor driving some twenty hours by motor to be here with our bags.

Come in, called the King cheerily. A frock-coated hotelier bowed in the doorway, clasping his chubby pink hands in front of his miffed, beaming and bowing, he ushered in a head waiter, followed by two assistants carrying a long narrow table, every inch of which was covered with platters of appetizers.

Breakfast in a moment, Excellencies, he purred, but I felt a few appetizers first would not be amiss. Your Excellencies must have been sorely tried by the discomforts of your trip, so I have permitted myself the great liberty of bringing for your approval some caviar, the Soviet overlord seldom allow to go beyond their own tables, a bit of sturgeon, worthy, I think, of your consideration, anchovies without the slightest trace of saltiness, Gantz Grubchen from a noble goose, some thin slices from a fat little woodcock, a melon that's as sweet as honey and as soft as snow, a morsel of cold grouse—

Please do not go on, interrupted the King hastily. Do let us discuss the great liberty of bringing for our approval some caviar, the Soviet overlord seldom allow to go beyond their own tables, a bit of sturgeon, worthy, I think, of your consideration, anchovies without the slightest trace of saltiness, Gantz Grubchen from a noble goose, some thin slices from a fat little woodcock, a melon that's as sweet as honey and as soft as snow, a morsel of cold grouse—

Bowing to the King, the hotelier closed the door behind himself and his retinue. As the King helped himself to a Central European Arms Conference he occupied these very rooms, and— What, interrupted the King, are your political affiliations? Conservative, Excellency, answered the man promptly. The King nodded briefly. Then you consider yourself a good Royalist? he demanded. A good Royalist? asked the proprietor in an aggrieved tone. Why Excellency, my hotel is the only one that the Prince of Saxe-Radig-God rest his Highness' brave soul! ever patronized, except, perhaps, the Imperial Cafe, and that is run by Max Bush, my brother-in-law. Why, Excellency, his Highness often spoke to me! During the War, officers with their wives stayed here on leave. Since the War I have tried to keep things just the same for the old aristocracy. Last week the Minister of War, Baron von Ulm, gave a dinner here for the officers of the Pomeranian Grenadiers. We had morning his wife, the former Countess of Sonderburg, smiled at me from her carriage and said, Good morning, Herr Director Schwam. Only the other evening I endorsed a note of hand for Major Ems, who had some reverses at the Casino, and last night Colonel von Stedman graciously ordered ten cases of champagne from me and stood me a drink at the bar. Fritz said the Colonel—these were his very words—Fritz, you're a good old sow! And you ask me if I'm Royalist, Excellency! Why, he continued, his voice rising in indignation, if I wanted to collect from the old aristocracy and the garrison officers, I could make the hotel pay.
