AYLMER BEANS with PORK and Tomato Sauce

Tender beans cooked to nutritious perfection in a spicy tomato sauce - just the right amount of pork for that "Boston Brown" flavor - that's Aylmer. Your family, too, deserves Aylmer quality.

The Queen's Holiday
BY Elizabeth Corbett

It was pitch dark and raining heavily, Elsa began to run ahead along the track. Ahead always ahead, so long as her breath lasted! Alone, penniless and on foot, she was once more a fugitive from Leucadia.

When her breath had given out completely, Elsa came to length to a dirt road which crossed the track. There she paused to look back. All about her stretched open country; not a light, not a sound in the darkness. She turned up the collar of her coat, though she was already wet to the skin, and chafed her hands together. Then she turned to her right down the road and plodded along through the mud. All she could think of now was to get somewhere where it was light and dry.

At length she did actually spy a country inn; she was amazed to see that it was still lit. Actually the hour was early in the evening, but it seemed to her that it must be after midnight. She summoned all her resolve and pushed open the door. A stout innkeeper looked up from his pipe at her entrance. The weather had kept patrons away tonight; Elsa and he had the taproom to themselves.

Elsa asked him in Leucadian, whether he spoke that language. Oh, yes! he said. He was so close to the border, he had to speak both languages.

"Very well," said Elsa. "I'm traveling with a party and I've lost touch with them. I shall spend the night here, so that they may find me in the morning. Can you make me comfortable? I shall want your best bedroom, a good fire, and supper."

The innkeeper called his wife, and the wife stirred up a woman servant. With considerable bustle the three of them installed Elsa in a ground floor bedroom and lighted a roaring fire.

"They were still setting out her supper when an ostler returned to the inn in a state of great excitement. There had been a train wreck at the frontier; the President of Leucadia was hurt, and he didn't know how many others.

For the first time the innkeeper looked at Elsa with suspicion; she had arrived with an incomplete story, and not only without luggage but without so much as a purse.

"You were in that train wreck, perhaps, Madame?" he hinted. "It was there you became separated from your party?"

"Please get me some paper to stuff my shoes so that they will dry in shape," she requested. "And if I can borrow a dressing gown or something while my clothes dry, I shall be grateful!"

There were no dressing gowns, but she was presently accommodated with a wool petticoat and a jacket. "Don't bother to come back for the supper dishes," she directed. "I do not wish to be disturbed."

As soon as she was alone she got into the makeshift garments, and put her own clothes to dry before the fire. Then she drew the curtains, carefully locked the door, and piled against it such of the furniture as she could drag across the floor without making too much noise.

within and turning to close the window.

"How did you ever find me?" gasped Elsa.

"Followed a fellow who came this way from the frontier. He turned in here at the inn. He looked like a stambler or something."

"It was an ostler. He had heard of the wreck. He brought word that President Tilsius was hurt."

"No one else is, I hope. I felt sort of remorseful about the shaking-up I had to give everybody."

"No one was damaged in the wreck that I know of except that Tilsius fell off the platform. But there was shooting. Prince Paul and poor Carl Sierndorf—"

"Shooting? Pshaw! I hadn't reckoned on that. You're all right yourself, though aren't you?" Ted seized her by the arms and took a long look at her. "You look quite pretty and quaint; as if you were dressed for a masquerade."
