Marriage Scales

By Mildred Barbour.
PRIDE TRIUMPHS.

The minutes passed while Doris sat dreaming on the log beside the quiet little river wrapped in its twilight peace, and Craig Cullum watched her with his heart in his eyes.

Finally, with a start, Doris looked up, met his glance, read there something that set her heart to beating tumultuously and brought the swift color to her cheeks. Her eyes widened, her red lips parted.

Cullum made an involuntary movement toward her. The hour, the solitude, the girl he loved—it was almost too much for his self control. His arms half lifted to crush her to him—before he remembered.

In that moment, Doris had sprung up, with a deeper crimson in her cheeks. She had said, half frightened by the emotional intensity of the moment:

"This is charming—but I'm afraid it's high time we were turning back to town."

The sound of her own voice and its casual sentence, steadied her. The delusions fear which had seized her, slowly subsided.

But to Craig Cullum, every whit as proud as she, her action was a rebuff and a rebuke. His arms, dropped to his sides, silently he thanked her for restraining him from making a fool of himself, but it was the bitterest moment of his life. He honestly believed that she had dispelled the magic of the moment deliberately to show him that he must not overstep the barriers of cordial friendship.

With that thought in mind, he hastened to reassure her by adopting the quiet, cheerful manner of which he was capable. It wasn't for nothing that he was hailed one of the finest of the younger actors today. The role he played on the return ride to town was a perfect bit of histrionics. He chatted away amiably on impersonal subjects, discussed the progress of the pageant chorus, outlined plans for its improvement. He allowed the dangerous silence to creep into the dialogue, and he drove at a fast clip, apparently quite oblivious to the lovely vista of fields and woods in the clear moon-light.

Doris rose to the occasion with all the poise of which her pride was capable. She met his apparent nervousness with a calm and dignified air. She reached her door, she thanked him prettily for a charming evening, called a good night, and sped up to her apartment.

Once inside, with the friendly door closed behind her, she drew a deep, tremulous breath, tossed her hat to the floor and collapsed in a wretched little heap on the nearest chintz-covered divan.

She cried, stormily, heart-brokenly, steadily.

Tears didn't come easily to Doris. Unlike Mariani, she never sought quick solace in weeping. When she cried, it was over something distinctly worth crying for. Most of the vexing little problems which brought tears to her eyes, she held proudly high, biting her underlip, and forcing a gallant smile to a tremulous mouth.

But tonight she cried as she hadn't cried in years. She felt that her heart was broken and her pride was trampled in the dust. In that revealing, breathless moment on the river bank, she was sure that she must have let Craig Cullum see how it was with her. And he hadn't spoken. The look in his eyes, his impulsive yearning movement toward her—could she have been mistaken, she asked herself passionately? Was it after all only the cheap reaction of a man toward a pretty girl with whom he is alone in the twilight of a beautiful spring evening?

She couldn't believe it of him, of the man she had come to admire and respect and love. And yet, she asked herself, what other explanation could there be?

VALENTINA CHEVOLIER in "SCARAMOUCHE"

Opening at the Prince Edward Tonight.

There never for a moment occurred to her the real reason for Craig Cullum's not telling her that he adored her and wanted her for his wife. So accustomed was she to her wealth and social position that both were as rudimentary as living and breathing. She was totally without vanity or snobbery over two assets which had been bestowed upon her at birth and toward which she had no sense of personal accomplishment. Her money meant to her nothing more than a means of existing comfortably and daintily and being generous to others less fortunate than herself. She mingled freely with poor people and felt no different from them. As for her social position, she had turned over the task of doing the family honors in that line to Mariani, who liked it, and had betaken herself into fields of activity where she found a sense of usefulness and was immensely entertained as well.

In her love for Craig Cullum she had been quite frank, she had not sought her own former attitude toward stage people was shared by the members of her world to a large extent—and that amount of clash when going into low gear. It can be relieved to a great extent by having the motor in such condition, that it will idle very slowly, so as to have the main transmission drive shaft revolve as slowly as possible. Nothing can be done to remove all the clash.

THAT CAR OF YOURS

BY HARRY E. PORTER

This is a series of articles pertaining to maintenance and repair of your Automobile. We will be glad to answer through this column questions regarding your car or its mechanism.

Send your inquiries to "Automobiles," The Guardian, Charlottetown.

Do you know that when you turn a corner in your Automobile, that you put a strain on the chassis and differential of your car that is abnormal?

It can be relieved to a considerable degree by depressing the clutch and taking the corners slowly.

It also relieves the tension of the fellow's nerves that happens to be coming the other way.

Take your time turning corners; save your car, and perhaps your life.

Ques.—My generator will not charge unless I get out and close the cut-out points, when she will charge all right. It is a _____ Car. Is the trouble in the cut-out?

Ans.—The trouble of which you speak, appears to be the short armature coils in your generator, which decreases the voltage below that which is necessary to close the cut-out points.

It will be well however, to see that the commutator of the generator is clean and the mica underneath.

If this does not remove the trouble, an electrician should test the armature.

Ques.—My battery discharges itself in the course of a day or two without even being on the car. What should I do to correct it?

Ans.—It will be necessary to have your battery disassembled and new separator installed.

Ques.—When I change gears in my _____ Car, there is quite a clash. Can this be fixed—if so, how?

Ans.—As there is no clutch brake on this particular make of car, there will always be a certain amount of clash when going into low gear. It can be relieved to a great extent by having the motor in such condition, that it will idle very slowly, so as to have the main transmission drive shaft revolve as slowly as possible. Nothing can be done to remove all the clash.

Insidious Eye strain

We use this adjective advisedly. Sufferers from Eye strain may have perfect vision and therefore do not suspect the presence of any eye defect. The motive power of the entire human organism is Nerve Energy. Normal eyes, it is computed utilize about 20% of this Nerve Energy, but when Eye strain is present, a much larger proportion is required. Hence defective eyes, through their consumption of an excessive amount of Nerve Energy, may seriously affect the functioning of other organs of the body, and produce ill health.
