The Woman who Loved —And Earned

BY JANE PHELPS

A Modern Story of Home and Business

CHAPTER VI.

We were married the first week in October. I told Robert that I had rubbed Aladdin's lamp and that the wonderful weather we had for our honeymoon in the White Mountains was the result.

I was deliriously happy. Robert was all and more than I had pictured he would be. He was so tender, so loving, so all that seemed to be necessary in a husband that I felt like a happy child instead of a staid saleswoman of 25.

We were staying at a very nice, quiet hotel, yet one that we could scarcely afford. But Robert said:

"It's only for a week, and as you are determined to work I may as well use some of the money I have been saving to go to housekeeping with, ever since the first day I met you."

It was the first time he had spoken of any saving for that purpose and someway there was a tone of a hurt child in the words. But I pretended not to notice, and changed the subject.

Afterward I thought of it, the hurt little note in his voice came back to me, and I made up my mind that I too would save, and some day, a long time distant, perhaps we would go housekeeping; perhaps we would have a home such as Robert dreamed of having.

Often I have looked back at that happy week of my honeymoon and wondered if all brides are as happy as I was. If all men were as thoughtful, as perfect as Robert seemed to be—when first married. And I have decided they are not. Robert loved me unselfishly. He gave up his own dream of a home without making me uncomfortable, just as he gave up other dreams he had had without even letting me know he had been dreaming.

I felt, in that glorious week in the mountains covered with their mantle of red and gold drapery, as if the sun would always shine upon me as it shone upon those wonderful trees, making them glow and quiver like living things. And just as the golden light filled with colour and glory the earth around us, so would Robert's love fill my life with sunshine, I believed.

To those who have studied the marvelous physiological effect upon women of love, of happiness, the exuberance of my feeling will not seem strange. My life had been rather drab and dull. Not as much so as many girls who were obliged to work, because until I was 18 I had had Mother. But my ambition to become expert in the business had left me little time for frivolity. So now I was making up for lost time, I told Robert. And I laughed, and sang, the blessed hours away, while we wandered along the mountain paths, finding new beauties each day and, as Robert said: "Getting acquainted."

"I want you to know Mrs. Meredith," he said one day after a mock introduction. "You think she is the same woman, you used to know as Geraldine Frost, but she isn't. That Frost girl was quiet and rather dignified, while Mrs. Meredith is a happy mountain sprite."

"I am not the only one who is different!" I assured him. "You are changed too. I never knew I had married a poet, rather a man with a poetical mind. 'You never know a person until you have lived with him' should be 'until you are married to them.' But wait until we get back to town; I'll wager we will both be practical then."

I little knew how prophetic was my speech!

Not once had Robert spoken of my giving up my work; not once mentioned his disappointment that he was not to have a home. The reference to the money he had saved for furnishing was the only hint that he had thought of it. But the evening of our last day he was very silent. We were sitting on the broad piazza of the hotel, he was smoking, my hand clasped in his.

"What are you thinking of, Robert?" I asked.

"Of tomorrow—we must go back to everyday life. Isn't it sad, Gerry, that joyous things never last?—We shall be just a prosaic couple like thousands of others tomorrow. You will be wrapped up in your work, I in mine. Now we are engrossed solely in each other. I wonder—how it is going to work out."

"What do you mean, dear? What work out?"

"Our lives together. Come dear, it is growing chilly. Let us go in." He had not given me time to answer.

(To be continued.)

Went For Days Unable To Eat

SYDNEY WOMAN HARDLY MORE THAN FRAME BUT TANLAC SOON MADE HER FEEL FINE

For the past seven years I have suffered from indigestion and stomach trouble and never found anything to help me until I began taking Tanlac," said Mrs. William W. McDonald, who resides on Prince Street, Sydney, Nova Scotia, recently. Continuing, she said:

"I had scarcely any appetite at all and when I did manage to force down a little something it would sour and ferment and I would bloat something dreadful. At times I would also become terribly nauseated when it would be utterly impossible for me to retain a thing not even a glass of water. I finally was in such bad condition I would go for days without being able to eat a mouthful. I could get but little sleep and felt tired and worn out all the time. I had no energy and my house work was simply a burden to me and most of the time I would just have to leave a great part of it undone. I would have the worst sort of headaches that would nearly drive me wild. I lost weight until I was scarcely more than a frame and became so weak I thought I would just have to give up entirely.

"One day I saw a statement in a newspaper from a friend of mine in which she told of the remarkable benefit Tanlac had been to her, and this decided me to try it also. Well, when I started taking Tanlac I was so weak I could scarcely get about but, now after taking only three bottles my recovery is simply remarkable. I feel stronger than I have in years and am able to do all my own housework with the greatest ease. My stomach never gives me the least trouble, my appetite is just fine, and everything I eat agrees with me perfectly. Those headaches have all gone and I can sleep all night long as peaceful as a child. I have gained in weight considerably, and all my friends tell me they never saw me looking so well. Tanlac is certainly a great medicine and I am glad to say a good word for it."

Tanlac is sold in Charlottetown by Reddin Bros., in Montague by H. J. Mahon, in Georgetown by Seymour C. Knight, in Souris by Jos. G. Ferguson, in Kensington by Kier & McFadgen and in Emerald Junction by P. F. Hughes.

HINTS FOR The Motorist

BY ALBERT L. CLOUGH

CHARACTERISTICS OF THERMOSIPHON COOLING

In the Gravity or thermosiphon system no circulation or transfer of heat occurs until the jacket water is distinctly warmer than that in the radiator and, for this reason, the cylinder-walls retain much of the heat developed, when first the engine is started from a cold condition. This tends to hasten normal vaporization of fuel, to reduce the thinning of the cylinder oil with condensed gasoline ends and to bring the engine into satisfactory running condition. However, in order to provide adequate cooling capacity under extreme conditions, this system requires that a very large amount of water be carried and the engine must be run for a considerable time before its temperature, as a whole, is elevated to the most efficient point. As the rate of circulation and of heat transfer depends upon the difference of temperature of the water in the engine and in the radiator and as the boiling temperature is the highest that can be attained, when the whole system has been heated practically to the boiling point, circulation virtually ceases and any further increase in the rate of heat development may not be properly taken care of. Theoretically, when steam is being formed in both engine and radiator, circulation stops and the cooling of the radiator is the only thing that can start it again. As circulation is by syphonic action entirely, it depends upon the existence of a completely closed circuit of water and thus if the water level falls below the intake of the radiator from the engine the syphon is broken and circulation ceases. As ther is no pump in circuit to impede the movement of water when the engine is stopped, circulation continues at such times — the heated jacket water still flowing into the radiator—with the result that the system as a whole continues to lose heat faster than does the pump system, other things being equal. For the same reason, however, water is not likely to be forced out of the radiator by steam formed in the jackets, when the engine is shut down in a heated condition. Because of its relatively slow water circulation, the average jacket temperatures obtained in a thermosiphon system tend to be higher than those in the pump system and this is of advantage. Since it includes no pump, there is an entire absence of packed joints and mechanical complications, but the large flow sections required in jackets and piping and the great volume of water required to give a safe margin of cooling ability result in a system of considerable weight.
