SOLDIER DROWNED AT NORTH SYDNEY

NORTH SYDNEY.— Private John P. McKinnon, of the 94th was drowned at the breakwater this afternoon while bathing with some comrades. McKinnon, it appears, jumped over the end of the breakwater into deep water and being unable to swim went to the bottom and was drowned before his companions could do anything to save him.

He was later brought to the surface unconscious, but before he could be taken ashore disappeared again. Thirty-five minutes later with the aid of grappling hooks the body was recovered and taken to Dooly's morgue, where an inquest will be held. The deceased was nineteen years of age, and joined th 94th Battalion last December.

A CANADIAN SOLDIER'S QUESTION.

Could we bid farewell to honour
Could we see our comrades slain
Could we sing with pride O Canada"
With neither name nor fame.

Could we cheer old England's soldiers
As they marched away to fight
And idle stand while a ruthless foe
Dared Honour, Truth, and Right.

Could we think of our fair Dominion
Who for bravery n'er did lack
Ever lift her head, while the Hunnish flag
Stood in place of the Union Jack.

"Like the roar of the ocean's billows
As they crash, against the rocky shore
Will we fling to the foe our answer "NO"
As we did in days of yore?

Nations, may rise and fall again
And men may war no more;
Kingdoms may rise and fight again
And know not peace no more.

Mountains that rise to the azure skies
May moulder with age away
But we would not, could not, and never will, stoop
To dishonour, come when the may."

WOUNDED ISLANDER CALLS FOR MORE RECRUITS.

Private Daniel Arsenault in writing to his mother from the Hospital in England where he has lost a limb, makes a strong appeal for more recruits:

England Military Hospital.
July 1st, 1917.

Dear Parents.—

Just today after being up out of bed I thought it was a nice time to drop you a few lines as I have seen many strange sights since I have left home.

Well the first things is when we were in Valcartier all that you could see was boys dressed in khaki and when we left it was still the same all along the line, you could not see anything but soldiers. When we reached Halifax it was the same, soldiers everywhere. So then we stayed aboard the train over night and the next day about 10 o'clock we went for a march through the town and you bet that there was some shouting done when we returned to the train, as we had to get ready to board ship. We got in the ship but did not leave till next morning about six o'clock. I was not up when we left but the boys were shouting so I had to get up. We then had breakfast and each got a life belt and in the afternoon we had boat drill. That was great fun for us. We started by run up stairs to see what company would be up first. Of course it used to take us quite a while to get up but we got there just the same and in enough time to save ourselves if anything would happen to the boat or if she had been struck by a mine or torpedo.

We had a good crossing. It was nice and calm but just blowing hard enough to make it cool so that we would not be seasick.

We landed in Liverpool and I can tell you it was some sight for it is such a nice Harbor and a nice city too. We did not see much of the city however, for we boarded the train right away and started. We had a great time going to Shorncliff, landed there at 10 o'clock in the night and slept in tents in a big Valley. It was a nice place as it was so warm at night, after that we had to go to work the next day and get things ready for drilling, but we had a nice place to drill in and did not work too hard.

It was then time to talk about going to France and I was one of the lucky to do yet before we were ready for France so we worked our very best so that we could get there. Well finely we got a draft taken out and sent to France and I was one of the luckky ones to go.

We reached the Canadian Base at the Harve stayed there two days and then started for further up the line. naye waaeo fkenoohl4ulna SHRMH It was dark and we could see nothing. We then had about one month and a half training when finally our turn came. We started for the trenches and things were very quiet until Easter Monday when our brave Canadian boys did their share in taking Vimy Ridge and lots of our boys were wounded and lost their lives. I was one of the wounded. Some of our boys have lost their lives since that big push and lots of my chums have been killed but they will never be forgotten. Well I tell you that the Germans got quite a surprise when the Artillery opened on them and nearly got all their guns put out of action. That was a good thing for us, as there were not as many shells flying around us and we got to our big objective at last and got dug in. The first thing we knew was that an English Battalion was coming to take some woods that were ahead of us, so it left us in great support. It was a lot better than the front line for we could sleep at night from 8 o'clock till 5 o'clock then stand till seven in the morning and then go back to bed and sleep.

Here I am in the Hospital having lost one of my legs but it is nothing as I lost it doing my duty and now I will say it is time for the young men of P. E. Island to show themselves reasonable and join in the army and fight for their King and Country and do their part like we are trying to. I know if they had seen all that I have seen that they would answer to the call when their country calls them.

Will say a few words about the good people in this Hospital. I am well treated and could not be any better if I was home. The nurses are just like my sisters would be to me if I was home.

As my letter is long and not interesting I will close by saying cheer up boys and come forward and do your part for your King and Country for you are needed to help win the war.

Love to all the folks from your son,
PTE. DANIEL ARSENAULT.

THE TRAVELER'S TREE

"As we sailed up the river (the Tharoka) the traveler's tree became very plentiful, and soon gave quite a peculiar character to the landscape," says James Sibree in his book, "A Naturalist in Madagascar." This remarkable and beautiful tree belongs to the order which includes the plantains and bananas, although in some points its structure resembles the palm rather than the plantain. It is immediately recognized by its graceful crown of broad green leaves, which grow at the top of its trunk in the form of an immense fan. The leaves are from twenty to thirty in number, and are from eight to ten feet long by a foot and a half broad. They very closely resemble those of the banana, and when unbroken by the wind have a very striking and beautiful appearance. The name of 'traveler's tree' is given on account of its affording at all times a supply of cool, clear water upon piercing the base of the leaf-stalk with a spear or pointed stick. This supply is owing to the broad surface of the leaves which condenses the moisture of the atmosphere, and from which the water trickles down, into the hollow, where the leaf-stalks join the stem. Each of these forms a little reservoir, in which water may always be found.

"The name of 'builder's tree' might be given to it with equal or greater propriety, for it is as useful to the coast people as the cocoanut palm is to the South Sea Islanders. The leaves are used for thatching and the long stems, fastened together, from the filling-in of the framework for the walls and partitions; the bark is beaten out flat and forms the flooring; while the trunk supplies timber for the framing. Quantities of the fresh leaves are used every day and take the place of plates and dishes; and at the New Year's festival the jaka, or meat eaten at that time, was always served up, together with rice, upon pieces of the leaves of this tree or of the banana; and a kind of spoon or ladle was formed by twisting up part of a leaf and tying it with the tendrils of some climbing plant. The tree ranges from the seacoast to the height of about 1,500 feet, after which it begins rapidly to disappear. At an elevation of about 1,000 feet it is extremely abundant, much more so, in fact, than any other tree, and is the one striking and it is not found so much in the peculiar feature of the vegetation. forests as on the hillsides in the open country; it has some half dozen or more different names among the various tribes on the eastern side of the Island."

WHAT'S IN VOGUE

New Effects in Silk Somewhat Odd

This is the season of silk, and there are so many really attractive types that the more one looks at them the harder it is to choose.

One of the new gowns has rather an interesting feature. The girdle and sides are decorated with a charming landscape; if one would look carefully a moonrise can be seen at the right of the girdle, and also on the skirt.

Smoke gray embroidery and silver create the effect.

A gray moon-glow meteor is the foundation and the folds and draperies are wonderfully soft in this lustrous material.

The weird arrangement of the wings on this unusual hat accentuates its novel appearance. Both hat and wings are biege color.

To relieve the sombreness of many of the all black dresses there has been introduced, printed or embroidered chiffons or marquisettes which are used to drape the skirt and to partly veil the bodice.

The effect is at once elegant and subdued and if there is little bead embroidery employed the touch of the frivolous is thereby imparted and without any maring effcet on the ensemble.

It is a fad of the season to have the stripes of a single material run at two three or more angles in the made up costume.

SELENIUM INCREASES SPEED OF TELEGRAPH TRANSMISSION

Of late years many important uses have been found for metallic selenium, and the true value of its properties is daily becoming more apparent. The element is a vital part of a recently announced invention that is reported to more than double the capacity of submarine cables, says Popular Mechanics. According to trustworthy information, the apparatus in use on some of the Atlantic cables has increased by about 125 per cent. the speeding of handling commercial messages. Selenium cells operate a siphon recorder and amplify the signals to such an extent that more than twice the usual transmission speed is obtained without lessening the legibility of the graphic records. The apparatus has increased the transmission speed on one Atlantic cable from 200 to 450 letters a minute, it is reported. Even better showings have been made in special tests.
