BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess)

Help another, and in turn
His co-operation earn.
—Old Mother Nature.

Yap Yap and Mrs. Yap Yap, who had left their home in Yapville the Prairie Dog town because Blackfoot the Ferret had made it no longer a safe place to live, had spent a troubled night in an old Badger hole. They were wide awake and outside just as jolly, round, bright Mr. Sun appeared above the rim of the prairie for his daily climb up in the blue, bluish sky. First they would eat breakfast, then move on to look for a place to make a new home, a place much farther away from their old home and dreaded Blackfoot, who was likely to stay in Yapville as long as any Prairie Dogs were there.

Getting breakfast was an easy matter, for they lived on tall grass, and it was all around them. So they ate breakfast, a little more hurriedly than usual perhaps, but no less heartily. And they didn't forget for an instant to watch for danger. While Yap Yap was cutting a mouthful Mrs. Yap Yap was sitting up watching, and while she was getting a mouthful he was sitting up watching. Breakfast eaten, they moved on in the same careful, watchful way as on the day before. They kept to the tallest grass and weeds as much as possible. There they were least likely to be seen by hungry hunters on the ground or in the air. If they saw a speck in the sky they squinted close to the ground and watched it until they were sure it was not one of the Eagle or Hawk folk. It wasn't so easy to watch

"What are you doing here all alone?" demanded Jack Rabbit for enemies on the ground, for even when sitting up they couldn't see far over the tall grass and plants.

Once they were frightened almost out of their wits as they started to creep into a clump of tall plants. Something that was bigger than themselves leaped out on the other side, giving them such a fright that for a moment they couldn't move. Then they saw that it was Peter Rabbit's cousin, Jack Rabbit. He had been doing there and was as startled as were they.

Seeing who had startled him so, Jack Rabbit stopped. He wasn't afraid of a couple of Prairie Dogs, nor were they afraid of him. "Such ears!" exclaimed Mrs. Yap Yap. "How would you like to have such long ears as those?" "I wouldn't," Jack Rabbit chuckled. "I don't want Blackfoot the Ferret for a neighbor."

"PLACING" CARDS

The only time declarer should "place" a key card in a certain defender's hand, is when the card must lie there to show the declarer a chance. Consider this deal:

North-South vulnerable.
♠ 9 4
♥ Q J 10 2
♦ K 5 4
♣ 10 8 7 5
N
W
E
S
♠ 6 3 2
♥ 9 5
♦ J 7 6 3
♣ A J 2
♠ A K 8 7 4 3
♥ 8 7 6 3

The bidding:
South West North East
1♥ Pass 4♠ 5♥ Pass

West said later that he had considered sacrificing at the five level, but felt that he might push the enemy to a makable slam. Actually, a club lead would have beaten even the five-heart contract, but West was not a fortune teller, and opened the spade king. South won with the blank ace, drew two rounds of trumps, then, since he could discard only one club on dummy's diamond lead, a club toward the king. South felt sure that the club ace would be in West's hand, "for his bid." The confidence was misplaced, however, and three clubs were quickly collected by the defenders. Down one!

If South had had to depend on West's holding the club ace his play to the king would have been obvious, but that was not the case! Consider this line of play:
After drawing trumps, South ruffs dummy's remaining spade, then cashes the top diamonds. He sees West "fall" on the third round dummy's last diamond and give the trick to East, discarding an ace from the closed hand. This is the opponent's first trick—and what can East do to win two more? If he returns a spade or a diamond, declarer gets rid of still another club while ruffing in dummy; if East returns a club, whether he or West had the ace, dummy's club king is established.
