The Circular Staircase

By MARY ROBERTS RHEHART

XIII

Meanwhile our cook had left, worried by all the excitement, and Master Gels, the cab driver, found another, some new one had a pitted face, but Halsey said that didn't matter if she could cook. Halsey himself seemed restless in these days, and the night when the new cook arrived he left the table early, excusing himself on a spy ground that he wanted to see Alex, the gardener. But when Alex came in later to look up the house, with Sam Bohannon, the colored man who had taken Thomas's place, he said he had not seen Halsey.

Louise by that time better, had joined her mother in the apartment the latter had taken, and now she drove up. "Where is Halsey?" she demanded, but none could tell her. And it was not until four o'clock the morning that Mr. Jamieson brought her the news that Halsey's car had collided with a freight car on the siding and been wrecked, and that Halsey himself had disappeared.

From Warner, the chauffeur, we learned the events which preceded Halsey's disappearance. He had gone to the library of the house while Gertrude and I were out and had heard Halsey and some woman talking.

"I'll see him in hell first," Warner quoted Halsey.

"I knew there was something wrong from the first," the woman answered, according to Warner. "A man isn't well one day and dead the next."

But Warner thought the woman was speaking of Thomas, and that being, as she said, a spy did not want to hear more to find out who she was.

Louise in the apartment which her mother had taken and, still ill, was guarded by a nurse like a gorgon. There was rumor in the village, brought by Liddy, that she and Doctor Walker were already married.

Mr. Jamieson, the detective, brought Riggs, Doctor Walker's chauffeur to the house. Riggs had quarrelled with his employer and he had done a good many things for the doctor he had turned a bill had done was to keep watch, in response to a letter from Doctor Walker from California, on Louise, and also to look out for a woman pitted with small pox, known as Nina Carrington. And our cook had a pitted face.

Mr. Jamieson had been anything but negligent in looking for Halsey and finally found a tramp who admitted robbing my unconscious nephew whom he had found in an empty box car. The box car was traced and we learned that Halsey had been taken from it at Johnsville and put in a hospital. Thither Gertrude drove to bring him back.

While Gertrude was away Mr. Jamieson and Doctor Stewart asked me to go with them on a strange expedition. They did not tell me what it was, but Mr. Jamieson instructed me to wear dark clothes and old shoes, and I did so. At night we started and I noted that with us was a man I did not recognize carrying over his shoulder some implements I could not place.

They led the way to the cemetery and halted before the grave marked by Paul Armstrong's tombstone. There I recognized Alex our gardener and the implements she carried were two long-handle spades.

I said nothing but Mr. Jamieson and Alex set to work and soon dug up the coffin which bore the name of Chicago, but was far from the lid, but the face of the dead man within was not that of Paul Armstrong.

XIV.

Meanwhile more misfortune overtook our servants. Our new cook crossing the railroad was struck and killed by a train and Anne Watson was forced to go to a hospital, the injury to her arm having developed blood poisoning.

One day I was summoned to the hospital for Mrs. Watson was dying. She told me a pitiful story. She had been the sister-mother of a large family in a little town in the mid west, but one by one the children died except Lucy, the baby, who was Lucy nineteen, a young man stopped in the town en route to his home in the East, fell in love with a nurse and married her, giving his name as Aubrey Wallace. He took her to Chicago, but was far from being a model husband and at the end of three months deserted her.

Later Lucy died on the birth of a little boy, and Anne took the child and named him Lucien. She she set out with the boy and Aubrey being a man of some means, she obtained a place as housekeeper with the Armstrongs, where she found Lucy's husband under his own name—Arnold Armstrong.

At first Arnold gave her money for the boy's support, but then, realizing that Lucien was the ruling passion in Anne's life, turned the tables and demanded money from her on the threat that he would take the child. She took the child from her home and put him with the woman in Richmond.

THE CHRISTIAN AND HIS BALLOT

Rise up, O children of the King, and know
There is no peace while there exists a foe;
Rise up, O Christian, lolling in the sun,
There is no peace till victory is won;
Till every home is safe from sea to sea,
And from the liquor trade the land is free.

Hark! Ringing down the hill from Galilee,
"Take up your cross today and follow me!"
Where's the cross? To lead a meeting?
Fill with prayer
And plous speech the Wednesday evening air!
Not just to lift with shoulder sure and strong,
Your part to rid the world of sin and wrong;
Just to take up the ballot sheet and say,
"Try kingdom come," and help it come that way
Just to stand true; to fear not gain or loss,
But bravely to ignore the party boss.
Never for silver the dear Lord betray;
Not once deny Him on election day;
But, careless of the world, of bond and stocks,
Dare follow Jesus to the ballot box, sweet, divine;
And hear Him say, with voice clear,
"Who conquer still by love's immortal sign."
