Little Turkey had said the same and a faint apprehension of danger disturbed me. I was keen to inquire who his first victim was, but this would be a grave social blunder. So I produced one of my pistols and placed it on his couch. With a grunt of delight he seized upon the weapon, which was of large bore and gaudily decorated with silver. Little Turkey touched my arm to intimate the audience was ended. I followed him into the sunshine and he said: "My white brother's friends should come now. The smoke of a peach pipe covers those who can see, or smell it."

"They will be here soon," I assured him. "The smoke covers them. It was agreed that I smoked for the three of them."

He remained silent for half a minute staring toward the entrance in the stockade. "They smoked, when you smoked," he finally remarked. "But old men sometimes forget. It is easier for them to forget if an evil bird whippers in their ear."

He had given me a friendly warning. To ask him to interpret and go into details would have been useless. I knew he was my friend just as I knew the young warrior seen in the chief's cabin would be my enemy. I observed the slight straightening of his figure and a flash of his eyes as he beheld Damoan the Fox and a group of warriors approaching us. The chief's grandson had informed my enemy of my presence, for he stood at Damoan's right hand and was pointing at me.

Among the Humas were several of Damoan's Choctaws; and with his hand on a pistol thrust through his sash the Fox gave a sharp order. The Biloxi Choctaws darted forward, but Little Turkey, already sensing the hostility between the Frenchman and me, leaped before the Choctaws and flung up his right hand and cried: "They have smoked!"

The Choctaws fell back. Damoan cursed in French and ordered them to seize me. But even his new ally, the chief's grandson, dared not seize the peace calumet. In plain English he reminded the Fox that the stem of the peace calumet did not extend beyond the stockade; in plain English once outside the palings we could fight to our heart's desire and the savages would enjoy watching the spectacle. But the village inside the stockade, like the Cherokee "white" towns was sanctuary, and those who had been received in peace could not be disturbed.

With the first flush of anger succeeded by cold reason Damoan knew the uselessness of opposing this ancient custom of the Humas. With his thumbs hooked in his red sash he swagged up to me, and quietly greeted: "So, English spy, I've caught you at last."

"French spy, you mean you have caught up with me," I corrected. "And where are the rest of your red friends—asid from those feeding the catfish in the river?"

He showed his teeth in a thin-lipped grin and informed me: "Outside, hunting for your friends. No pipes have been smoked out there. I told them not to hurt the woman, I think I shall keep her."

He desired to enrage me into an impudence, so he might shoot me in the plea of self-defense. I did not rise to the bait. He went on: "I came here to smoke the calumet and get some red trackers. I never dreamed of this good luck. My manito is very strong. I knew you had landed for there were scraps of meat and bones on a rock in the river, where your lookout had eaten."

I mentally cursed old Six Fingers for leaving the signs, although I was the more to blame for not looking after him.

"En bien, canaille," I said, "when we meet again there will be no calumet stem between us."

"Nothing but red wampum, but wait, Tiens! You will find it droll."

And from the medicine-bag at his girdle he took out a green scalp and shook out the long, blond hair. Switching it close to my face he said: "A souvenir of the crazy Frenchman!" My heart pumped tumultuously; but my face was frozen in its calm expression.

"Because you took his hair I will lift your scalp some day, Damoan. My manito tell me you will be bald-headed before the Moon of Turkeys (October)."

He laughed, but now his hate showed through his mirth.

"Fool! Bald-headed yourself! I will keep the woman till she tires me, and I will decorate her leggings with the hair of the mad Frenchman and with that of the White Indian—one scalp for each legging."

At this grassiness my gorge boiled over, and despite the calumet I would have attacked him had I not been confounded by a fresh situation; nothing less than the appearance of Mademoiselle Dahisgaarde running into the village closely followed by Labrador and Six Fingers. Naturally believing that Damoan's Choctaws had flushed them from their hiding-place and were hot on their trail and that at any moment they would be pouring into the stockade, eager to kill because of their ignorance of the peace smoke, I ran to meet the girl.

Damoan himself also started forward, for I heard Little Turkey raucous voice proclaiming: "They are in the peace smoke. Let no one forget the shadow of the peace calumet."

I glanced back and observed the Humas had glided in between Damoan and his Choctaws and me. The next moment the girl had both my hands, and was crying:

"Oh, monsieur! I felt you were in danger. They tried to stop me. When they were not looking I ran up the path. Thank the good God you still live!"

"As mademoiselle is to see much of me, Monsieur Brampton, suppose you present me to her," suavely suggested Damoan at my elbow.

The girl stared at him wonderingly; then began to shrink behind me to escape his evil gaze. She was guessing some of the truth of the climax; and as it was best that she should understand all I bowed to her, and said:

CHAPTER XI

"Good Luck! This Will Be Death!" I hurried her to a cabin where she could be alone with two Huma Women and took up my quarters in an adjacent cabin.

"Scuttle me! But what's to stop these red buffies from boarding us now? anxiously demanded Six Fingers, referring to the Biloxi Choctaws in the village.

"We will not be molested while in the village," I assured them. "I have smoked for all of you."

"Aye? Then God bless the pipe!" growled Six Fingers with much relief in his voice. "But were I not locked here. Where's the channel? And when do we up with our hooks and sail?"

"I'll find the channel before night. We must get away tonight if it is possible."
