

"I SLEEP WITHOUT SMOTHERING"

"I was for two years totally unable to do my work with Asthma. I was so run down that I could not sleep day or night. I had no appetite. I tried several treatments but got no relief. A friend advised me to try Overseas Asthma Remedy. I got a bottle and it has helped me so much I am now able to be about my work as I used to be. I can sleep all night without smothering and choking as I have been for two years. I have a good appetite.

"I am willing to answer letters asking about what it has done for me." Mrs. John J. McAdam, West St. Peters, R.R. McStewart, P.E.I.

The Third Warning

A Mystery Love Story

By Augustus Mahr

"That's the man," I said. "Do you know him well?"
"No, very slightly. He has dropped in to have a drink at Black Edge a few times when he happened to be near. As a matter of fact he came in yesterday. It was he who told me a new laird had turned up. He said you were a young fellow and described you in a vague sort of way. Indeed, it was he that put me on to the idea it was you, for Joseph's description if you, which I dragged out of him, rather resembled Seymour's. So I thought I'd drop in on the chance that my guess was correct."

"I'm glad it was," I said heartily, and I strolled out with him in spite of my dressing-room, to the side gates where Smith got into a neat two-seater and was gone with a wave of the hand and a cry of "Seven o'clock tomorrow!"
I went back to dress in a pleasant frame of mind. My morning's caller interested me immensely. He must have been a man of 50 or more. I felt that with a little encouragement he could be extremely amusing—a philosopher and a wit. He certainly had charm, though it was possibly that charm which (in men at least) comes from an extreme degree of candor; for he was not afraid to show his emotions, as was obvious when he spoke in sorrow about his dog.

And then the old Adam within me arose with a warning forefinger: I must not let my feelings run away with me like—well, like Smith! It was almost my settled policy by this time to suspect every soul I met, or, at least to regard them as potential enemies until they had proven themselves friends. Besides, an unwary word dropped even in the ear of a friend might lead to my undoing. I must listen and watch, and, for the rest, I must mind my own steps—for indeed it was a tight-ropes act for I was walking, as events had already proved. Still I liked Smith, and in him I saw a useful ally: I saw, too, the possibility of gleanings from him information about Seymour which might possibly be useful, and I decided to revive the subject of Seymour which I went to dine.

As I shayed, splashed in an old tub bath and dressed, my thoughts wandered to George. The place was indeed dismal without him, but I must make the best of a bad job during the few days he was south. I had promised—and common sense approved the sanity of it—that I should refrain from any further offensive, or tours of exploration, or needless risks, till his return. But now that notion took up an rksome aspect. I desperately wanted to be up and doing; to have something concrete to show by the time George came back. I ran over in my mind last night's work, and it occurred to me that I had carried out my task of watching with amazing clumsiness. What, for example, was to prevent any one from stationing an assistant to watch this cottage and give the warning when I called forth? No; merely to explore the grounds and keep an eye on the Hall every hour or two, wasn't good enough! And I planned a better way. I decided to sleep in the Hall that night. With a little care I could surely cover my tracks so that it would appear I was spending the night as usual in the cottage. So during my solitary lunch I set my mind to the task of arranging my movements for the evening.

But my movements for that evening seemed likely to undergo drastic revision. For about 5 o'clock a messenger arrived with a telegram. It was from George, and was worded with typical Georgian precision: "Travel London tonight. Meet you St. Pancras, Urgent. Staying Berkeley George."

I gazed at the thing in amazement. What in the world could have happened? Had George been undergoing attentions similar to mine and stumbled on some explanation? His wife said plainly that he was staying at the Berkeley Hotel. It would take a traction-engine, as a rule to drag George away from his comfortable flat to spend a night at a hotel, be it ever so good. Therefore there must be some good reason for the move. And what was the news he had for me. He gave no reasons for the order—merely "Travel London tonight," with "urgent" as the compelling phrase that always clinched an instruction of this sort. I scribbled a few words assuring him I would come that night, traveling Midland and arriving at St. Pancras, and handed the wire message to the messenger.

There was none too much time, and I started to pack at once, with very mixed feelings. I was, of course, glad that things had come to some sort of climax, but was sorry it hadn't happened here on the spot where the real battle of wits had taken place. Then, again, how long were we to be in London? George had left a considerable portion of his kit here with me; did he mean me to bring that south, together with my oxen? I decided not; it held meant that he would have said so; and I shoved enough things in a suitcase to do me three or four days and lugged it out to the door.
I suppose Jessie stumbled over it and drew the obvious conclusion, for she burst into the sitting room with a very troubled face. "You're never going away, are you?"
"I'm afraid I am, Jessie."
"Oh, and you so happy here, and Mr. Collier coming back beside you— you said he'd be back in a few days, sir."

"Yes but I've got to go. It's most urgent. You see, it's Mr. Collier I'm going to. He's in London, and you may bet we'll be back together soon."

"Ah!" smiled Jessie. "That's not so bad. I thought you were tired of the place, or me not pleasing you w' your meals—"

MacDougall United Church is fortunate in obtaining Rev. G. H. Villett, B. A., as pastor to succeed Rev. Wilfred Gaetz, who has accepted a call to go to Prince Edward Island, the new appointment to become effective on July 1 next.

Mr. Villett, who is a son of Mrs. Catherine Villett, Victoria P. E. I., will bring to MacDougall church ripe scholarship combined with a profound love for the church and its ideals. He was born on Prince Edward Island and received early education at the Prince of Wales College.

At first he contemplated adopting teaching as a lifework, and actually did enter the profession. Later he entered the employ of the Bank of Nova Scotia, and while serving at Amherst, N. S., in 1913 responded to a call sent out by Dr. Buchanan.
Arriving at Suffield, Alta., he served under Dr. Tuttle, who was superintendent at that point, and in 1916 decided to continue his studies and accordingly entered the University of Alberta.
In 1917 he answered the call to the colors and enlisted for overseas service in the Royal Air Force, in which branch of the service he became a lieutenant.
In 1919 he resumed his theological studies and in 1922 was graduated in arts, and the following year in theology.
He won the Alberta Old Boys Scholarship for general proficiency in his entire course.
Subsequently he was stationed at Iron Springs for two years and one-half, at Taber for a similar period, and at Pinches Creek for two years. He has been church convener for religious education for four years and of home missions for one year in the Lethbridge presbytery, and trained what was generally regarded as "the most outstanding Tuxis group in the dominion" in Bible examinations.
At all times he has been active in social and community enterprises. He married Miss M. E. MacLean of Westsaskatoon, one of the first women students in medicine and arts at the University of Alberta.—From Edmonton Bulletin, April 16, 1926.
