SWISS DO NOT LIKE MILITARY SERVICE.

BASEL, Oct. 6.—The call of the Swiss government for volunteers to serve as defence corps to supplement the regular army of 300,000 men is meeting with a poor response. About 16,000 men have volunteered, whereas it had been expected to enroll 150,000. On account of this situation the government is considering compulsory enlistment. If this step should be decided upon the Swiss army will be the largest in the world in proportion to population, as twelve per cent of the 3,000,000 inhabitants are foreigners.

HOW ISLANDERS SPENT VICTORIA DAY AT THE BATTLE FRONT

The following letter has been received by Mr. Montague McIntyre from his brother, Will, who is now in France:

Somewhere in France, Sept. 20, 1915.

Dear Mont—In your last letter you requested me to give an account of our life in the firing line. I will start by giving you an impression of the scenery. In a great many respects this country is like the Maritime Provinces. The climate is very similar, also the mode of cultivation, small grain fields, large vegetable gardens and orchards, and numerous ornamental trees, as well as an abundance of flowers. Hedges and ditches take the place of fences along roads to separate fields. All buildings are of brick or stone with tile floors and the houses are large, those of most of them are protected by shutters of various styles. The roads are built of crushed stone or paved with blocks of stone. The inhabitants are industrious and take great pains to beautify their property, but are unsanitary as regards their farm dwellings.

I will try to give you the experience of the Fifth Battalion on one occasion.

The time was in the month of May. Birds were singing, orchards in full bloom and grass and grain waving a foot high in the breeze. The place was—Somewhere in France. We had just taken up new billets, they were in a reserve trench in an orchard, our place of residence had been holes in the earth and they were cramped and damp. The new quarters were promising, our beds were of dry unthreshed straw pulled from stacks close by, our covers and waterproof sheets provided cover against the hardest tasks being winds. We were filled with a sense of false security owing to the close proximity of a battery of 4.5 howitzers, with their short muzzles protruding through a hedge and occasionally belching forth discomforts for the enemy. Here our days were filled with idleness, our hardest tasks being to remain still and look up while hostile aircraft purred and soared overhead. Our nights were mostly spent in carrying material for the construction and repair of trenches.

One night we left our billets and filed down the road, on through the remains of what had once been a small village, now it was a jumble of ruins, with hard wood and softwood and is distant about four miles from Souris. A good title is guaranteed and immediate possession will be given. If not sold before November Second, 1915, it will then be sold by Public Auction.

For further particulars apply to the Office of Fraser & McQuaid, Souris, or to the owner Mrs. Catherine McLellan of Elmira.

of my comrades, driving into the ground, but did not explode. At last it ended and we drew a long breath of relief. We picked up our loads and moved into new territory because it had just been wrested from the Germans.

We climbed over sand bags into a narrow trench. A graver feeling passed through us as we thought that only a little while ago our toes stood where we now stand. There lies their equipment and knapsacks, large square packs, made of cowhide with the hair outside, here and there was a rifle with bayonet fixed.

We came up to one of our comrades who wore a smile on his face, but cautioned us of danger in the trench, because what was the German's back is now our front parapet. On we press turning sharp angles around traverses and squeezing past comrades, one wonders how two beer loving Hunners ever passed in such a narrow trench. At last we came to an opening, it is a hole blown out by a shell and we climb over more sand bags into the open. Here we deposited our loads and wearily retraced our steps back to the billets.

As I was not there I will not attempt to describe how the Germans shelled our boys and how they were finally forced to partly abandon this trench the following day, or when the bombardment stopped they drove the Germans out again.

Two nights later we had retired early and were sleeping, when at half past twelve we were awakened and ordered to get into our equipment as quickly as possible. All was hustle and clamor, but at last every man was ready and we lined up. The roll was called and we numbered off, then our officer explained to us that it had fallen to our lot, to attempt to wrest another piece of territory from old Germany.

Our orders were given us and away we marched down the same road, across the same little bridge, through the same gap and into the same captured trench, out through the same opening as we had gone two nights before, out and behind the trench we filed and took up our allotted position. There we waited that little word "Charge!" As we waited in silence, many were the earnest prayers quietly spoken, for well we knew, that many of us would never return. Minute after minute passed and finally an hour passed; it seemed the longest hour I had ever lived and yet it passed too soon. Daylight broke and still we waited. It kept growing lighter and lighter, hopes began to rise, that it had been called off. Suddenly at the end of the trench I saw a shape rise up and disappear over the parapet, then another and another, then came the report of bursting bombs. Bang! Bang! Bang! We tried our bayonets to see that they were firmly fixed, then grasped our rifles more firmly and crouched a little lower.

The end of the line on our right was mounting the parapet, so up we sprang upon our parapet. What came next I do not know, but we were to have gone to two distinct lines but we had gone as one man, over the heads of those who held the trench, onto their front parapet we stepped and then jumped down and started across for the enemy.

There, in the hundred yards in front of us, in the gray light of morning, loomed our goal, a long white wall, the top of which glowed with rifle fire, here and there a long tongue of flame indicating the position of a machine gun. On we swept, not pausing though our best chums were falling on both sides of you. This was no place for spare words, for your life was your goal and the enemy that had killed your chums. We breathe in short gasps, we stop a little lower, we run a little faster and once again grasp our rifles tightly. We do not fear the snap of bullets, although we are passing through a veritable hail of bullets and crack on rifles and machine guns, mingled into one crackling roar, supplemented by the bursting of bombs. On the right we hear a low cheer. Turning our heads we notice our comrades are climbing into the Hun's trench and presently we cheer ourselves, climb up the parapet and drop inside. Here we discover the bombers have done their work well, for those of the enemy who remain are dead.

We turn our attention to renovating the trench, for what was their back must be changed into our front, so we tear out the iron loopholes and build them into the opposite side. It doesn't take volumes to chronicle the incidents that were crowded into this day. How some were crowded out and rescued wounded, how closely we watched for any movement of the enemy, we were isolated, no reinforcements could reach us. Hour after hour dragged by, we had no food and but little water.

The day finally faded into evening, evening into night. The air was filled with star shells and the night was dark as day. Hour after hour we waited for relief that did not come. We gathered our wounded and prepared to take them out with us. At last relief came up and we learned that they had dug a communication trench to reach us.

The dawn is just breaking so we picked up the wounded and started over the same trench as we travelled through us as we passed a huddled form here and another there and thought of the sacrifice of human life or what seemed to us such a small gain.

At last we reached the dressing station and bade farewell to our wounded comrades. We then started for our billets and rest. That is how we celebrated the twenty-fourth of May.

Well, Mont, this is quite a long letter or me to write, so I will close now, hoping to hear from you soon.

BILLY.

P.S.—It was in this charge that Gordon of Montague and McDonald, rather Islander, were killed.

THEY ARE DOOMED TO DISAPPOINTMENT.

PARIS, Oct. 5.—General Mahmed Cherif Pasha, one of the leaders of the Radical Turk party, writing in the Marin, affirms that the Young Turks have "sold Constantinople to Bulgaria, with the pledge of receiving in exchange Russia's Asiatic possessions, Egypt, and all of the North Africa, always assuming, of course, that Germany and her allies defeat the quadruple entente powers."

Cherif Pasha points out that, if this programme should be carried through successfully, the greater portion of the Mussulman world would come under Turkish domination. He also asserts that it is the hope of fulfilling his ambitious dream of securing himself crowned in the Mosque of San Saba, that has led King Ferdinand to raise his arms against France, Russia and Great Britain.
